IT was a true note that Dr. Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton, struck, in his address the other day in New York, in laying the cornerstone of the Memorial Church. He said that a better name for Institutional Churches would be Vital Churches. They are, he said, "churches that get close to the life of the people; that know how to help a man when he gets into difficulties, without making a botch of the matter; that understand how the people live; that are neither side-tables for poor relations, nor mere gloomy praying closets." This is the need of the times. There has been too much of the characteristic that a famous writer called "other worldliness" in our churches. While the main business of the pulpit is to proclaim the Gospel and to prepare men for a future life, it does not fulfil the whole of its mission unless it helps men in their life here.

There are problems in human life in these days that the minister can never learn in his study. He may preach academic sermons of exquisite beauty, yet fail to give his people the help they need. When a business man goes to church, looking for strength to enable him to resist temptation; feeling that the struggles of the week have given him a sordid view of life, and longing to have his faith braced and toned up, he comes away disappointed if he has listened to a discourse on some abstruse doctrine, even though that discourse has been able and eloquent. He feels that the question discussed may be interesting to the theologian, but has little concern for himself. The minister must know the difficulties of his people in order to give them the remedy they need.

Then, too, the Church itself should be adapted to the time, and it was perhaps this that Dr. Van Dyke chiefly intended. The Christian should know that, in a difficulty, his best helper may be found in the Church. Its educational service to his children, its relaxations, its provision for the craving of his nature for relief from business tension—all bring him into closer relations with it. These helps are sanctified and hallowed when they are associated with the Church. Through them all, there should run a constant stream of religion, reminding all who benefit by them, that there is a higher future life, for which this life is a preparation, and that in incorporating the principles of Christ in their daily lives, they are fitting themselves for the heaven that they will enter at the close. Thus Christianity becomes not the antiquated museum of doctrines that it is too often considered, but a real, vital, living force in our workaday world.

Preparations on the Isthmus

A WORK so gigantic as that of cutting the Isthmus of Panama needs to be undertaken with deliberate forethought. The United States will not make the mistake, which ruined the French Company, of beginning the task before plans are fully matured. Already the preparations are well under way. Foreseeing the sickness which, in the unhealthy climate, is likely to develop among the workers before they are fully acclimated, the hospital at Colon has been enlarged by the addition of a new wing. This is providing for the worst, but efforts are being made to remove the danger of sickness by careful sanitation before the beginning of the work. Our illustration on this page shows the new buildings prepared for workmen who may fall ill. Another illustration shows the car prepared for the use of Chief Engineer Wallace, enabling him to inspect every portion of the canal as the work proceeds. The collection of lumber for the docks has already been begun. A photograph is here given of one million feet, which has been brought to Colon in readiness for the beginning of the work.

SCENES ON THE ROUTE OF THE NEW PANAMA CANAL

As previously announced in this journal, radical changes have been made in the French plans. It has been determined to abandon the plan of M. de Lesseps of making the canal of one level. There are to be five locks, effecting a saving in initial cost of nearly one hundred million dollars and a saving in time of construction of about one half. It is now believed that by the present plans the work may be finished in eight years, at a cost of $144,000,000. The adoption of the lock system was made after the commission had carefully studied the canals in Europe, the Kiel Canal in Germany, the North Sea Canal in Holland, and the Manchester and Liverpool Canal in England. The advantages of the locks were so obvious that the change in the plans was made, though it involved the rejection of more than half the work done by the French Company. About thirty million cubic yards of excavation will become useless under the new plan. The line of the Canal, however, will run about as it was originally planned. It will be nearly fifty miles in length and it will take about eleven hours for a medium sized ship to pass through it. For more than half the distance it follows itself of the valley of the Chagres River. It is proposed to construct a gigantic dam at Bohio, which will create a huge artificial lake thirty-eight square miles in area. The canal will run through the lake for about twelve and a half miles of its length. The point at which the canal leaves the lake, begins the most difficult of all the sections. It is known as the Culebra Cut, and extends from Obispo to Pedro Miguel. Here the level is considerably higher, and it is for this that the locks are necessary. It is nearly eight miles long, and involves an excavation of forty-three million yards and an expenditure of one-third the entire cost of the canal. Only one more lock is needed between that and the end of the canal in Panama Bay. Of the value of the Canal when it is completed there can be no question. It will be appreciated not only by our own citizens, in bringing our eastern and western shores into easier communications, but by every maritime power having dealings with the great nations of the East. In former times, an undertaking so gigantic as that of severing two continents and uniting two oceans would have been regarded as beyond human power.

Who hath cleft a channel for the water flood or a way for the lightning (Job 38: 25 R. V.)

Rats Save Lives

The old superstition that rats deserting a building is an indication of approaching trouble of some kind, has been verified at a mine in Pennsylvania. For some time past, the pillars supporting the roof of the Coalbrook mine near Carbondale, have been giving signs of weakness. They had been robbed from time to time, and had been worn by frequent friction. The miners knew that they were liable to yield, but they continued their work, as men do, when a catastrophe long threat-west of the Rockall rocks. To his astonishment, he found himself out of his course. He could not understand it, and took another observation at midnight by the Pole star. He then found that he had not been out of his course at noon, as the compass indicated, but the compass itself was wrong. Three other captains have reported that in the same region they had noticed remarkable deviations of the compass, and it is now believed that in that locality there is some unexplained variation of the earth's magnetism, and that this was the cause of the wreck of the Norge. If there are in that region influences which cause the needle to vary from its true direction, it is not surprising that ships should be lost there. We know it is so in the spiritual world. Men have often done wrong things, when their conscience has been led astray by wrong motives or by strong temptation.

Take heed therefore that the light which is in thee be not darkness (Luke 11: 35).

Wholesale Abductions

A man is in prison in Morrisania, N. Y. on the charge of abducting a number of Italian youths during the past year. It appears that there have been coming to the police of that district for some time past complaints ened, fails to occur. On Oct. 27, however, while they were working in the old cutting, some large rats ran past them up the gangway. One of the men noticed them, and believing that some disaster was about to happen, called to his fellow workmen, and the whole company followed the rats out of the mine. They had scarcely reached the outer air, when, with a roar and a rush the roof of the mine fell in. The cutting in which they had been working two minutes before was filled with coal and dust. Had they remained, nothing could have saved them from being crushed. The movement of the rats being an omen of coming catastrophe would be regarded by many as a superstition. The fact, however, that one man believed in it was the means of saving many lives. How many souls might be saved if men would cease to regard the warnings of the Bible as superstitions, and would seek safety through Christ:

Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation (II. Peter 3: 3).

The Compass Affected

Since the wreck of the Norge with the loss of six hundred lives in June last, an inquiry has been commenced to ascertain the cause of the disaster. The captain was an exceedingly able man, yet he was twenty-five miles out of his course when the wreck occurred. The position of the Rockall rocks, on which the ship struck, was correctly indicated on his chart, and there was no way of accounting for the disaster. Inquiries have been made of other captains, and a clue to the mystery has been found. A Danish captain reports that during his voyage from the United States to Denmark, he took an observation when twenty degrees from Italian residents of the disappearance of their sons. Search was made for them but they could not be found. A clue to the mystery was found in a letter from one of the missing youths to his parents, from a lumber camp in North Carolina. He said that on the day he left home he had been accosted by a well dressed man who spoke excellent Italian, who induced him to go to New York on the promise that if he went immediately he would have employment at a high rate of wages. When he reached New York he was taken to a saloon and told to wait there, and was allowed to drink at the Italian's expense. He did not know what occurred afterwards until he found himself on a train with other boys going to some destination of which he knew nothing. He had been taken to the lumber camp and compelled to work there under threats. Search was made for the Italian and the man was arrested. It is alleged that he received a bonus for every youth he sent to the camp. If the man is guilty, he deserves severe punishment. How much worse is it to introduce young men, as so many heedlessly do, to places in which they are held captive by sinful habit.

It were well for him if a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were thrown into the sea, rather than he should cause one of these little ones to stumble (Luke 17: 2 R. V.).

"YOUR MAJESTY, I FOUGHT FOR FRANCE!"

THE men, manning the quarter-deck guns, crazed with the mad lust of battle in their veins, screamed frantically as they looked at that white, thin, slender old figure, sword in hand, by the side of their dead captain. It was the marquis fighting the ship, and magnificently, desperately, did he fight her! Not a mast was left standing. A few feet above the deck, the jagged ends of the foremast projected. The mainmast had been cut beneath the hounds. The mizzenmast had been carried away clean. The wreck had fallen in a confused, terrible mass to larboard. Its weight had dragged down the larboard side, and lifted the starboard side of Le Tonnant, so that her bilge was presented to the enemy. There was no time to cut the wreck away. There were no hands to spare from the guns. One half of her crew had been struck down, and most of them killed.

The girl dragged herself up the ladder, and went to the side of her grandfather, and touched him on the shoulder.

"Louise!" he cried, having forgotten everything in the mad lust of battle, in which the excitement of the contest possessed him, "we have beaten them! Look yonder!"

"Are you hurt, sir?" asked the woman.

"Hurt, no! I tell you we have won! She is silent! Going out of action! Look! Dismasted! Sinking! Hark, those are our guns! We still reply! For France, for France, men! Strike on!" he shouted.

Back of his master, musket in hand, knelt the figure of Brébœuf. Slowly and deliberately as if he were potting chickens, he was aiming at figures seen dimly in the moonlight and in the flash of the guns upon the English ship. She, too, was dismayed and helpless, but the brave Westcott had fought the Majestic superbly.

The relative strength of a French 80 and an English 74 was about as ten to seven. And the most that could be said for the achievement of Le Tonnant, in spite of the old man's exultation, was that the battle was drawn. The English were not completely silent, either, for a sullen gun from time to time poured its fire into the French ship. From her quarters, too, a sputtering, musketry fire was kept up. It is probable that the English ship might have done more had not Westcott fallen dead upon his own deck, shot by that marksman of marksmen, Brébœuf.

In the excitement of their own fierce battle, no one had paid any attention to L'Orient, and it was not until the awful crash of her explosion that the marquis called his men from the guns to extinguish the rain of firebrands that were hurled upon the ship. For fifteen or twenty minutes the crew were furiously busy averting this danger, and putting out ensuing fires, but so soon as it was over the battle was recommenced. Some of the men in each ship had taken advantage of the respite to clear away some of the guns encumbered by the wreckage, and the fight began with renewed fury. The marquis literally forgot his granddaughter, as he continued to direct the men of Le Tonnant. Her first lieutenant had been killed and her second wounded, so there was no one to dispute the command with him, had any one been so inclined.

Louise watched him, fascinated, dividing her attention between him and the rest of the warring fleets. She was still wondering where Macartney was. The anxieties, half formed and indefinite, which had been in her heart when the battle began, had cleared, and were definite and coherent, caused by the horror of the ship at her feet. She was filled with terror for the man she loved.

The fire of the Majestic and that of Le Tonnant became slower and slower. There was not a gun that could bear on either ship after a time. The two ships had been engaged at half pistol-shot distance for nearly three hours. They were both beaten to a standstill. The men unhurt on Le Tonnant were so exhausted that it was with difficulty that they could keep from falling prostrate by the guns, among the dead. It was only the voice and example of the indomitable old marquis that kept them up. Finally, at eleven o'clock, that voice was suddenly stopped. A well-aimed musket-shot from the English ship struck the old man full in the breast. He pitched downward by the side of the dead body of Dupetit Thouars in his bran-tub. Louise ran to him, and gathered his head in her arms. Brébœuf threw down his musket, and leaped to her assistance.

"Go, go!" cried the girl, "to the surgeons!"

"Stay!" feebly murmured the marquis, "'tis useless. No surgeon can do for me now."

"Let him be taken below," said Bauduy, the third lieutenant, now the ranking officer of the ship, who had been apprised of the catastrophe by one of the crew.

"Brébœuf threw himself, with outstretched arms, upon the sword-points."

"No, no," said the old man, "an admiral of France, dies best on the quarter-deck of his ship."

"Is there nothing to be done?" entreated Louise.

"Nothing," said the marquis feebly, "I have fought my last battle. Do I grow deaf—as I die—or is—"

"The fire has stopped," answered Bauduy.

"And the English ships?"

"Drifted away from us."

"We have beaten her then?"

"I think so."

"How goes the battle?"

"But badly, I fear."

There was a wild cry from the men forward. Bauduy sprang to the break of the quarter-deck, and peered ahead. A man came running aft.

"There are two other English ships bearing down upon us!" he cried.

"Where?" said Bauduy.

"There they come! We cannot meet them!"

"Don't strike—your flag!" said the vice-admiral. "Never!" answered Bauduy. "Cut the cable!" shouted, "we'll drift away."

In the darkness, Le Tonnant swung down past the rest of the line, past L'Heureux and Le Mercure who fortunately for Le Tonnant, took the brunt of the fire of the approaching ships with which they were so hotly engaged.

"What does Villeneuve?" asked the marquis faintly. "Nothing."

"Curses on him!" cried the old man. "He might have saved the day—for France."

There was nothing that could be done for the marquis. Even Louise could see that. With anguish her heart she made him as comfortable as possible. A rolled-up flag pillowed his head. She knelt by his side, and laved his brow. He did not suffer much. The shock of the ball in his breast, at close range, had been terrific. He lay perfectly still, but his mind was as active as ever. From time to time he asked the girl how the battle went. She would have given worlds to have encouraged him with the news of a victory, but it was evident at three o'clock in the morning that all was over.

Mercure and L'Heureux had been driven ashore. The three ships not yet engaged, Le Guillaume Tell, Le Géreux, and Le Timoléon had cut the cables and sought shelter with two frigates in the extreme southern end of the bay. Every other ship in the French fleet, except Le Tonnant, had been taken possession of or destroyed by the English. A silence, broken only by the groans and cries of the wounded on the ships, fell over that Homeric scene of battle.

"My child," said the old marquis, "die as becomes a sailor—in action. God forgive me if—at the last—moment—I fought against my king! I—I—forgo Those English—I fought them for sixty years. Brave Dupetit Thouars was dead—I took command—again—the king! May God forgive me!"

"He will understand, grandfather sobbed Louise, "I understand."

"'Tis a brave death to die—on the winning ship—yet—I would that it had been—under the old flag. Brébœuf!"

The old man crept wearily toward the marquis, and kissed his hand.

"Faithful Brébœuf! We owe you much—you will take care of the young comtesse? You will serve her as you did her mother—as you served me?"

"So help me God!" gasped the old servant.

"And Honoré. He—too—fought against—the king. There is left only you, Louise. You will be faithful, my child? You will tell his Majesty how it was?"

"Yes, yes," said the girl, "I will tell him everything."

"A Republic," murmured the marquis; "who would have believed it possible? Perhaps—they were right. I was too—old—to learn—you will be faithful, Louise?"

"Yes."

"What will become of you?" asked the old man tenderly. "If only that Englishman—you love him?"

"Yes," said Louise gravely.

"That is right. Death in the old heart—love in the young. Poor girl. Pray God he has escaped!"

"There's a boat alongside with a white flag, Lieutenant Bauduy," said one of the seamen, coming forward at the moment. "An officer, who says he comes from Admiral Nelson."

"Let him come aboard," answered Bauduy, stepping forward to meet him.

"Monsieur," cried a voice, out of the darkness, as the English officer stepped through the gangway, "Admiral Nelson wishes to know if your ship has struck?"

"It has not, sir!"

"Do you intend to give her up?"

"Why as to that,"—hesitated the young officer.

"Sir," said Macartney, not waiting for his answer, "are Vice-Admiral de Vaudémont and his granddaughter on board you by any chance?"

"They are, sir."

"Where are they? Are they—"

"They are yonder."

"May I go to them? I am Captain Macartney, your former prisoner. You remember?"

"You may go."

In an instant Macartney made his way to the little group on the quarter-deck. With a low cry of joy, the old man recognized him.

"You here?" she said. "Alive! Unharmed! Thank God!"

"Who is that?" asked the marquis faintly.

"Captain Macartney," whispered the girl.

"Why comes he here—for what purpose—have we luck?"

"I came to seek you, to seek your granddaughter," said Macartney, kneeling by his side. "Are you hurt?"

"Is it serious?"

"I have fought my last battle, lad. Ask your English ship—if it were a good one."

"'Twas a terrible one, monsieur; but it has killed me."

"'Tis nothing. I wish to go. I have outlived my age. I am glad you are come, monsieur. You love your granddaughter—I had other views for her—but the love of an honest sailor is good—you will guard her—watch over her—be tender with her?"

"With my life!" answered Macartney.

"I believe you—God bless you both—you will be married at once. You must find a priest of the old religion. Brébœuf—Louise—" he cried suddenly, his voice growing astonishingly strong. "Lift me up!"

It was four o'clock in the morning. The dawn already laced the east with its pale grayness. The light of breaking day fell upon the face of the old man. He lay across the decks and out to sea as if he were sleeping upon a vision. To his unresponsive ear at that moment came the roar of the guns of some far ship, opening battle.

"They fight still," he murmured, "we are not beaten—lift me—up—the flag!"

He stopped again. They gathered around him, awe-struck and silent.

"Grandfather," said the girl, "speak to me!"

But he was speaking to some one not of this earth.

"De Suffren," he said, "the English are there! strike hard!"

The blood gushed from his lips, his head sank forward on his breast. By a supreme effort he raised it again.

"Your Majesty," he said, struggling until he disengaged his hand from Brébœuf. Lifting his arm high in the glowing light he cried, "Your Majesty, fought for—France!"

With a low cry, Brébœuf laid the old man gently down upon the deck he had immortalized by his valor. The woman buried her head in her arms, and Macartney, before all, lifted her tenderly and clasped her to his breast in his strong and tender arms.

There was silence for a little space, when an interruption came. The survivors among the crew had gathered aft, staring at the Irishman. In the dawn-light some of them recognized him. They were overwrought with the strain of battle. They remembered the story of Garron's treachery, and it flashed into their minds that this man was perhaps responsible for their disaster. He had told Nelson where they were. He had brought destruction upon them. Growling and muttering ran through the group of men. Their high officers were gone, with many of lesser rank. There was no one to control them.

Macartney instantly realized that something was about to happen. He had that peculiar feeling for danger which was a part of the equipment of a great captain. He was unarmed, save for his sword. His boat's crew were at the gangway alongside. He would summon them. Putting Louise behind him, he stepped forward, only to be met by a rush of men toward him. They clustered around him with such arms as they could seize, threatening and menacing.

"You're the cause of it!" cried one curly boatswain's mate. "You brought the English upon us with that accursed arrion Garron! Kill him, kill him, men!"

"On deck, you Vanguards!" shouted Macartney, at the top of his voice, seeing how serious was the state of affairs. At the same time he whipped out his sword and made a lunge at the nearest man. The lunge was partially parried, and the man gave back, but at last the point of the weapon touched him. With a howl of rage he lifted his own cutlass and sprang forward.

"Aho, Vanguards! Bear a hand or God's sake!" cried Macartney.

Unless some diversion were made it would be too late. As he called, Louise, frantic with terror, threw herself upon his breast. Seeking to do him service she embarrassed him. He drew her aside with his left arm, and with his right held off the mob. But it would have gone hard with him had it not been for Brébœuf. He, too, sprang forward, and as the Frenchmen came rushing at the Irishman, he threw himself, with outstretched arms, upon the sword-points, gathering them like von Winkelried, into his mighty breast.

Such was the impetus of the Breton's leap that he fairly carried all before him. The men fell back in a confused heap, cursing and swearing. Before they could recover themselves the heavily armed crew of the cutter had reached the deck, and leaping upon the backs of the mob, silenced them. They made short work in getting to the side of their officer. They were few in numbers compared to the French, and it might have resulted seriously had not the Theseus and the Audacious at that moment dropped down, one athwart the hawse, the other ranging alongside Le Tonnant, demanding her surrender.

There was nothing to do but to obey. The French sailors were held in check by the Vanguard's men until a prize crew from the Theseus had come aboard and secured them.

Louise and Macartney had instantly turned their attention to Brébœuf. He had been pierced by a dozen blades. As soon as he fell, he had endeavored to drag himself toward the marquis. Macartney stared at him, not understanding his meaning. The woman was quicker.

"He wants to lie there," she said.

With his own hands, assisted by some of his seamen, Macartney lifted the gigantic Breton, and laid him at the feet of the marquis. The old sailor said nothing. Perhaps he had not the power, perhaps he had. He only took the hand of Louise in one of his great paws, lifted it to his lips, touched it tenderly, laid it down, stretched out his right hand, laid it upon the foot of the marquis, smiled at them, and closed his eyes.

Brébœuf was a silent man, and he died as he had lived, with no unnecessary words.

L'ENVOI

THEY buried the marquis, wrapped in the ancient lily flag of royal France, from the deck of the battered Le Tonnant, Nelson rising from his sick bed to do honor to the gallant sailor and gentleman. And as the body gently slipped into the waters of the bay, the shattered ships of the English fleet with half-masted flags, thundered out a vice-admiral's salute. Following him on his last journey were launched the remains of the faithful Brébœuf.

In the cabin of the Vanguard, a few days after, Louise and Macartney were married, Admiral Nelson himself giving away the bride. They had found a prisoner on one of the French vessels, a faithful pastor, whom one of the captains of the French liners had brought with him, for he was a man who had stopped following the precepts of the Republic when it abolished God.

Nelson ordered Macartney to La Mutine with despatches for England, his own gallantry being especially mentioned in them. With him Sir Robert took his wife and the faithful Aurore. The Leander, carrying Captain Berry with duplicate despatches, had preceded La Mutine, but had been captured by Le Généreux, one of the two ships of the line which, with two frigates under Admiral Villeneuve, had escaped from disaster at Aboukir.

Of thirteen ships-of-the-line and four frigates, the French had lost eleven capital ships and two frigates. It is believed that none of the four ships that escaped would have got away had Nelson not been wounded and thus unfitted for command. They were captured later, anyway, and none of them ever got back to France.

Nelson, although he blamed no one, was greatly disappointed at even the temporary escape of Villeneuve's four ships. As he had said years before, commenting on the satisfaction of an old-fashioned and unambitious commander (Hotham) who had not made the most of a victory, although he congratulated himself upon having done very well as it was:

"Even had ten ships been taken and the eleventh escaped, we being able to get at her, I should never consider it well done!"

"Many men know how to win battles," it has been pithily observed; "few know how to use victories. Nelson could do both."

Of the eleven French liners, five were burned, namely: the ill-fated L'Orient, Le Timoléon, L'Heureux, Le Mercure, and the unhappy Le Guerrier; of the two frigates, one was sunk and one burned. The remaining six ships-of-the-line were patched up and taken to Gibraltar and England.

The number killed, wounded and missing on the French fleet was never accurately determined. Estimates range from 3,500 to 5,000. Of the ships engaged, all the French admirals and captains, but one captain, were killed or wounded. Nor did the English come off scatheless. The Goliath, the Orion, the Vanguard, the Minotaur, and above all the Bellerophon and the Minotaur, were terribly cut up, losing many spars; the last two were completely dismantled, and nearly two hundred men killed or wounded on each ship. The total English loss in men was eight hundred and ninety-five. Not a great price to pay for the most complete victory in the most magnificent battle ever fought on the sea!

On receipt of this glorious news which Macartney delivered to the king on the second of October, he was advanced to the peerage, under the title of Lord Macartney, by his grateful monarch. Nelson was made Baron Nelson of Burnham-Thorpe and the Nile, with a pension of ten thousand pounds, a very inadequate reward for his consummate strategy, brilliant tactics, and magnificent fighting.

The French dream of an empire in the East was shattered to pieces by the thunder of the English guns. Three weeks later a courier toiled up to the headquarters of Bonaparte, then on an expedition to the southward, and told him the crushing, fatal blow.

"This will oblige us to do greater things than we intended," he said to Kleber, preserving his composure and his courage in spite of the death-blow of his hopes. "We must die in this country, or get out of it as great as the ancients!"

THE END

FAMILY WORSHIP FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

By BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT

Bishop John H. Vincent

In his introduction to the work, Bishop Vincent says: "Family prayer is an institution of priceless value where it is kept up conscientiously, seriously, regularly, and where it is endorsed by domestic administration and personal example. Where it is a part of a steady and genuine life, and not performed perfunctorily, it is full of power. The memory of it goes through life, hallowing every thought of home, reminding the wanderer of the days of innocence and devotion, and alluring him again to Christ, who was so long enshrined in the family circle. May the truth and the teaching presented in this volume find living administration and enforcement in the homes of its readers."

THIS extra large representative volume contains 480 pages, eight by ten inches, is embellished with 210 illustrations, and beautifully bound in blue art vellum cloth, with emblematic cover design in delicate ivory and ruby. It comprises a systematic course of reading of Scripture passages, an appropriate hymn, and an eloquent prayer for Every Day in the year, especially adapted for the Home Circle.

NATIONS RUINED BY DRINK

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

WORLD'S Temperance Sunday will surely have some decisive influence in checking the world's greatest curse, if the two-and-half millions of Sunday School teachers (2,410,818), faithfully present to their twenty-five millions of pupils (25,810,861), the national and personal warnings contained in this lesson, which shows how two divinely favored nations, Israel and Judah, that had first been made captive by drink, were easily carried captive by the Assyrians. This is the usual order in the fall of nations; first cancer, then conquest.

Isaiah, the greatest of the major prophets, a scholar and a statesman, uttered the brave warnings of this lesson to the rulers and people of Israel, which was made up of the ten tribes, which seceded under Jeroboam I. Great prosperity, as usual, had brought to both nations forgetfulness of God, and those destructive vices, intemperance and impurity, ever found with luxury. Similar luxury is developing in the United States and in the British empire, the very symptoms the prophet declared to be the signs of Judah's fall. When Isaiah spoke, the Assyrians were already sweeping like a "scourge of God," upon the upper kingdom, whose sin and fall Isaiah held up as a mirror of Judah's present sin and future fall, which occurred about a hundred years later.

1. The Wreath of the Reveler, the First Link in Israel's Chain of Captivity. Woe unto the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty.

Isaiah here calls the whole kingdom of Israel "Ephraim," after the name of its chief tribe. Samaria, the capital city of Israel, was built on the summit of a verdant, isolated, cone-shaped hill, where the marble palaces, glistening in the sun, seemed from the distance like the crown of silvery olive leaves with which its revelers were crowned at their feasts. Because its people were so given to wine, this "glorious beauty" was to become a lost crown, a "fading flower," which it is to-day, a ruin whose broken marble pillars are an eloquent warning against the vices that blight nations and individuals alike. The word sychar (John 4: 5), is supposed to come from shikorra, meaning drunkards, a monument of the shame described in the text. That it was real drunkenness, not a poetic allegory, Amos' testimony shows (Amos 4: 1). "Look," says Isaiah, in substance, "to the ruin which intemperance is bringing our sister state, and behold the same symptoms of approaching national death here in Judah."

The figure of a crown lost through drink, a laurel wreath blighted by dissipation, has a personal as well as a national significance, and recalls many a king, like young Belshazzar, whose doom came as he drank, and many a genius, like Poe and Burns, whose glorious beauty was a fading flower because the blight of appetite was upon his laurels.

A native of Peru has slain an animal for food. He leaves upon the skin some pieces of the raw flesh, and goes with it far up the mountain side upon the rugged Andes. He finds a crevice in the rock, lies down in it and covers himself with the skin, with the raw side exposed. The giant condor, seated on the cliff, or soaring far above the clouds, scents the flesh. He drops upon the pelt and pulls the flesh off with his beak. But the native underneath seizes him by the feet, and wrapping the skin around him, sells him at the nearest port to decorate some city park a thousand miles away. So many a genius, capable of lofty flight, is caught and carried captive through his appetite.

Overcome with Wine. The original word means one smitten, beaten, knocked down with wine, as with a hammer: laid prostrate, unable to rise. It is the fashion to lay such deadly blows of drink mostly on whiskey and the other distilled liquors, but it is wine which carries the bludgeon in this text. It is even worse to-day, when wine not only does its own mischief, but leads its victim on to the thrall of the spirituous liquors. For example, in France, where the people drink on the average more wine than any other people, and the purest wine, for they make it themselves, the wine does not lessen the consumption of stronger drinks, as is shown by a British parliament report, but the people drink more distilled liquor per capita than those of any other land, and the worst kind, absinthe, to which their doctors and statesmen alike, attribute, more than to anything else, except impurity, which is largely prompted by drink, the fact that France alone, of all the nations of the civilized world, has a birth rate lower than the death rate.

The commission appointed by the German Emperor to investigate the drinking habits of his subjects reported in 1904 the increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors amounted in cost to $125,000,000 a year. The Emperor is quoted as saying: "This tremendous guzzling must be stopped somehow." It is said that abolition of brandy and beer as part of the German army ration will probably be ordered. These facts with respect to Germany, and similar ones as to France, make sad havoc of the old stock argument about beer and wine being the cure for drunkenness.

"Overcome of wine!" That has been written of many who started in life as confidently as the bright boys and girls in our Sunday schools. Shall it be written of any to whom this lesson comes with timely warning? It cannot be true of any person whose practice is abstinence.

"Overcome of wine!" Shall it be written of you? Shall it be written of our country? Shall we not rather ourselves "overcome" this personal and national foe by total abstinence and prohibition, the only weapon with which it has been overcome anywhere? In this matter the Orient has been wiser than the Occident. Ancient India and Arabia were greatly cursed by drunkenness, but the religious leaders did not make the deadly blunder made by Europe and America for ages, of relying upon "moderation" and "license" as cures for this curse. The leaders in church and state in India said, in the name of religion and government, "Stop the habit, stop the traffic." And the result is, seven hundred millions of Hindus, Buddhists and Mohammedans free from even the hereditary taint of alcohol (a few have been corrupted by white men), refuting utterly the shallow sophistry of the indulgent and lazy, that "all men have an inherent appetite for drink that will be gratified in some way, and so it is useless to fight against it."

THEY SAID WE WILL DRINK NO WINE (JER. 35: 6)

Behold the Lord has a Mighty and Strong One . . . as a Tempest of Mighty Waters Overflowing. This is the prophet's description of the Assyrian army, which was pouring like a resistless, destroying flood, swept on by a tempest of hail, down upon the kingdom of Israel, to cast down its crown—a flood which God would stay, because Israel's sins called for judgment. This description is not too strong for the curse of drink, which, as a rising flood, is pouring through all the lands, increasing in every country of the world at the dawn of the twentieth Christian century. As in Israel and Judah in the prosperous time of our story, so everywhere increasing intemperance is the dread consequence of "prosperity." The "fat valleys" and the "overcoming of wine" evermore go together. This flood of drink is not a visitation of God, but is due to our self-indulgence and cowardice. We might have shut the flood out of the land by dykes of prohibition, and out of our homes by total abstinence. "Neither abundance of food, nor splendor of scenery, nor religious institutions, were able to preserve the Ephraimites from the effects of the dissoluteness which they courted by the use of the intoxicating wine. The Jews had a tradition that the wine of Plegiatha, and the waters of Diomasi cut off the ten tribes."

"AS A TEMPEST OF HAIL AND A DESTROYING STORM"

again the reveler's crown is pictured, not alone as faded but as trampled under foot. How literally all that is beautiful in life is trampled under foot by drink! Even the orange blossoms of a happy bridal are soon trampled on by a drunken husband—alas! with increasing frequency in these days of drunken wife! Love is turned to loathing. The beautiful boy becomes a bloated tramp, the beautiful girl a drunkard's haggard wife. Let us stop this treading of beauty under foot, and instead tread down the evil custom and stamp out the evil traffic. Let us put with Isaiah's "Woe to the crown of pride," Solomon's "Who hath woe," and Hakkuk's "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink." We do that when we directly or indirectly authorize another to do

As the First Ripe Fig. The gathering of the figs takes place about August. Now if any one sees a fig as early as June, he fixes his eye upon it and hardly touches it with his hand before he swallows it. Like such a daily bit will the luxurious Samaria vanish (Delitsch). Many a strong man has been thrown down, like a faded wreath, by wine, his money seized like the "first fig" by the liquor dealer! Habit (habet) means "It is you."

In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory unto the residue of his people. Here the prophet turns to Judah, which is to be the "residue" who presently Israel is carried captive; but even in Judah he seems to single out in this verse the few that are loyal before turning to the many whose intemperance will bring ruin to the nation. In contrast with the reveler's crown, this verse sets the crown of glory that God gives in his own favor and blessing to those who keep his wise and powerful laws.

Israel's captivity was perpetual, as we recall in speaking sadly of the "lost tribes," while Judah repented and was restored. So the many among those who enter the captivity of appetite are "lost," while a few only are restored, mostly those who have learned their despair that

And give us the victory again and again.

But these restored captives are the very ones who the boys and girls, with the most intensity, "prevention is better than cure," that it is easier to prevent than to repent.

They Also Have Erred Through Wine. Having pointed out the sin and punishment for the neighboring kingdom, Israel, as a faithful preacher and teacher Isaiah plainly tells the rulers of Judah that the same sins are to be found at home, and will bring like retribution sooner or later. "Israel enslaved to drink was soon to be captive to Assyria," he says in substance, "as so will you if you do not reform." The warning was vain. Judah continued to drink and indulge the other sins it leads to, especially in a luxurious time, and in hundred years the nation fell. The man who, in beginning to drink, says gayly, "I could stop, but I won't," taking no warning from the sot beside him who exclaims bitterly, "I would abstain, but I can't!" The greatest error of those who have to do with wine is the error which the French scientists are exposing in a bill-poster campaign against "alcoholism," which means the diseased condition of the tippler who may never have been drunk in his life, but whose bodily cells are all poisoned by a daily indulgence. Ignorant people call "moderation," and suppose to be harmless. It is gross ignorance to think the only peril in using toxicants is the danger of getting drunk. A monthly spree is less harmful than a daily tippie.

The Priests and the Prophets Have Erred Through Strong Drink. Thank God our American preachers are mostly right as to abstinence at least, though some of them, because moral questions did not receive due attention in their education, do not see that prohibition is the only right and effective attitude for the government to take toward a traffic which is the worst foe of the nation's homes, of its commerce, of its politics. Gladstone's great word "It is the purpose of law to make it as hard as possible to do wrong and as easy as possible to do right," exactly defines the aim of all prohibitory laws, and answers the objections, mostly based on the assumption that prohibition does not prohibit if it does not annihilate. The only proper test of a law is; "Does it make it harder to do wrong?" No statistics are needed to prove that prohibition makes it harder to sell drink than any other law for the liquor-dealers have recently organized a literary bureau that is paying advertising rates in newspapers for articles written to prove that prohibition is a failure. They will make some believe that, who have not wit enough to see that if more liquor could be sold under prohibition, with a license fee to pay, the liquor-dealers would favor and promote prohibition.

They Err in Vision, They Stumble in Judgment. In this description of the effect of liquor upon brain and soul, we get close to the reason why railroads and fifty-one per cent. of all American employers forbid their men to drink on duty—many of them requiring total abstinence at all times. A man who is even slightly under the influence of liquor is likely to make some error of vision or judgment that may have serious results or by loss of that "higher vision" that relates to character, to get into those vices that are so costly; that dishonesty is the logical result. Notwithstanding the fact that more than half of the American business establishments either require abstinence wholly of their employees, or at least while on duty, or discriminate in other ways in favor of the abstainer, the per capita American consumption of intoxicants is in 1904 greater than ever almost twenty gallons per capita, and the direct cost of $1,400,000,000, with as much more of indirect cost, and the American consumption is less than that of any other white community except Canada and Australasia. Canada consumes one-fourth and Australasia three-fourths as much.

*Lesson for World's Temperance Sunday, November 27, Isa. 28: 1-13. Golden Text Isa. 28: 7. "They also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way."

ARE AMERICAN CHILDREN ILL-BRED?

A N English lady who has brought up successfully a large family of sons and daughters, said with emphasis the other day, in conversation with a friend, that American children were very ill-behaved as a rule. I added, "I am not referring to the children of the poor." Her observations have been made largely among rich families, where the children had every advantage wealth could give, and teachers and governors bestow. For example, spending some weeks of midsummer at a fashionable resort, I came in contact with children of clergymen, professors and other highly educated people, and found them in many cases little savages. At the table they did not scruple to contradict their elders, interrupted conversation, clamored for the particular dainty they wanted, and generally run amuck through all the usual proprieties. A little girl belonging to my own family was a masterpiece at the ill-manners of the children with whom she played, and her astonished face at certain times was a study. Another child, accustomed to good behavior at home, and brought up on the excellent plan of implicit obedience, turned to her mother one morning, and quietly announced, "I shall not come at this when you call me; none of the other children run to their mothers as soon as they are called." It was a little declaration of independence, that sprang from a bad example. The little maid was soon told that whatever other mothers allowed made no difference; when her mother called she must come.

Not to speak of rudeness among themselves, the lady, who has traveled widely in America and abroad, considers American children extremely uncivil to old people, quite lacking in inference, and much too ready to express their opinions when older people are present. She thinks the coming generation will inevitably suffer, because the young people now growing up will be wanting in good manners, and conspicuous for selfishness and arrogance. While we may not altogether agree with our friend, or take the same view that she does, it is worth while for parents to stop and think whether there is not a little justice in what she says.

The mirror of a spectator's mind may be truer than our own, and we ought not to resent criticism which, though apparently harsh, has in it a grain of truth. Undoubtedly in the latter days, there has been a reaction from the severity of an earlier time, when children were kept under rigid authority, when they had few privileges, and were often unjustly punished. It may be that the pendulum has swung a little too far the other way. Generalizations are unfair. In walking down a village street, there may be six homes in which the children are gentle-mannered, amiable and very obedient, while in the seventh, they may be spoiled by indulgence, ruined by caprice, and very disagreeable in consequence. If parents could but realize the injustice they do their children by allowing them to become the dread of all they meet instead of the delight, they would take a little more trouble to train them well.

Southern children are seldom transgressors in the way of disobedience and incivility. One finds in a Southern household good manners the rule for the juniors, and mothers seldom speak twice, while children rarely put off attending to what is said until it pleases them to listen. The explanation of this is the traditions of discipline still linger in the South, and from the earliest years the small people are taught that they are not to be spoils, though they may be darlings.

My child," said a mother one day, "is so high spirited she will not brook control. I am waiting until she has reached the age of reason, and then I am sure she will see the foolishness of it to fly into rages at trifles, and to make everybody uncomfortable." Inquiring of this little girl's teacher, I found that the small tergent was a perfectly well-ordered and well behaved child in the schoolroom. No greater make is ever made than to fancy that habits of rudeness are formed, will be lightly laid aside when children emerge from babyhood into adolescence. The youth will be what the child was; the mature man and woman are evolutions from the youth. Why put upon a child the emotional strain that comes from constant yielding to ill-temper and perversity, and why expect that reason should succeed unreason because a few birthdays have been added?

Indeed American children are not polite, and if they do commend themselves to any except blindly adoring parents, the parents are the ones to blame. Some of those who read this bit of talk, may have opinions on this subject. Some may have remedies to propose, or suggestions to make. The Editor of the page will be very glad to hear personally from both married and single observers, it being a well known fact that old maids and bachelors often have very interesting views to present as to the training of children. Mothers may tell what sort of discipline they use in their families; possibly there are some among us who have no discipline at all. The family of a noted New England author was brought up on a system of perfect liberty. He declared that his children should develop as nature intended, and they did. They were terrors to the neighborhood during childhood, yet, contrary to every one's expectation, they have turned out to be respectable men and women. What do you think? If the subject attracts you, write and express your sentiments freely.

About Losing One's Temper

People are very seldom inordinately proud of a good temper, but a bad temper is something about which the owner is apt to boast. Whether it be the touch-and-go kind that flashes up on any slight provocation, or the slowly smouldering variety, that is not easily kindled and then burns a long time with a sullen flame; in either case it is thought to be the badge of strength of character. People boast of having a family temper, inherited from ancestors who were prone to fight over things great and small, and who were dangerous people to meddle with except in their moods of tranquillity. A man or woman who is habitually self-controlled, always even-tempered, and not quick to show vindictiveness or anger, is supposed to be weak. In reality it is the good-tempered person who is strong, and the ill-tempered who is weak. One should be utterly ashamed of losing temper over a trifle, and equally disconcerted if unable to keep it when facing a great crisis. Unless we can restrain our own passions, keep ourselves from hasty speech, or sombre, sullen looks, and dwell in the sunshine of that Kingdom of Heaven which is enthroned within the calm, unruffled soul, we shall never be able to govern others, or do much good in the world.

EVENING PRAYERS

In the sweetest hour of all the day	Look to the Saviour whose love divine,
The little ones come to the mother's knee,	Blesses the children who come to him.

"Better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."

"DOWN AT THE HEELS"

THE following practical advice is given our girls by a business man, and is worth heeding:

She was a sweet-faced girl. Her head daintily bore a picture hat, her gown was becoming, her complexion perfect, her hands well-gloved, but her shoes were scuffed and run-down at the heel. This oversight spoiled her entire appearance. She may have thought that her gown covered the ill-looking shoe, or she may have started out in the morning with little time to keep her appointment. Nevertheless, this evident carelessness or oversight marred her general appearance, and she was not the pleasing picture which she would have been, had her shoes matched the rest of her costume. Not long since, in a walk from the ferry to the office, remembering this little incident, caused me to observe the footwear of many of the ladies that I met, and I was surprised to see the number that bore a semblance, at least, of carelessness or thoughtlessness. Here a heel was run-down, marring the shape of the shoe, again a toe had been stubbed, and the enamel partially damaged, and then again, although the day was clear, and we had had no rain for forty-eight hours, there were the remnants of the muddy roadway crossed a few days before. Shoe polish is inexpensive, a lambskin shoebrush as well, and both easily obtained, and if a shoe when taken off at night is thoroughly brushed and wiped before it is put away, or if the evening has been wet and the shoes have become soiled, the mud is brushed off and the shoes left to dry overnight and then touched up with the polish in the morning, the wearer will add much to her appearance by this little act of care.

It is not the tight shoe or the small shoe that is most attractive. Either of the above is as ill-looking as a very loose or carelessly chosen foot covering, but a well-fitting shoe with a sensible tread and toe will add to a woman's appearance, even if her gown is not of the latest fashion, but has been carried over from last season, and her hat has not the most expensive plume or is the latest importation from the French flower emporium. If more attention were given to the footwear it would be surprising how much more pleasing the general appearance of our girls would be. A carelessly covered foot mars the beauty of the person. Even when playing tennis or golf it is not necessary to have a loose, rundown, badly-fitting shoe, but a trim, well-shaped and well-fitting foot-covering always best suits the wearer. The reason the fashion of wearing a large bow just above the toe becomes very much exaggerated, is in many instances owing to careless manipulation. It is not an unusual sight to see it poorly tied, with perhaps one end dragging, and thus is marred what otherwise would be a pleasing finish to the toe. A large bow should always be avoided when the shoe is loose or run-down at the heel or not well cared for. In other words, a large bow does not improve, but rather emphasizes a shoe in poor condition or one carelessly looked after and neglected.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—JEAN. To make pear butter or apple butter you must give up a whole day, as this sauce requires a long boiling process.

—MYRTLE. Do not take your little girl to stay overnight at a friend's house, except by invitation or previous arrangement.

—MAY. Do not marry a man to reform him. If he will not give up a bad habit for you now, he will not yield to you when you are his wife.

—A SUBSCRIBER. Older residents in a town should first address newcomers. If they fail to do so, speak first yourself; they may be bashful.

—JEAN. By dropping a line to Brentano, Union Square, New York, you may find the book you want, if your local bookstore cannot furnish it.

—MRS. E. E. W. I thoroughly agree with you that intemperance will always wreck the home. I am glad the symposium on the "Iowa Idea" interested you.

—NOVICE. The proper thing to say on being introduced is usually, "I am happy to meet you." When one's health is asked for, "Very well, I thank you," is the ordinary formula.

—ADELE. Thank you for your kind words. Decorate the house with chrysanthemums for the wedding. They will be very ornamental. If the day decided on be too late for this flower, I advise a profuse use of evergreens, and palms, and ferns.

—MOTHER. When the heart is sore from a recent bereavement, it cannot always at once realize that the dear one has gone to infinite happiness above. By and by you will understand as you do not now, that your child is waiting for you in heaven.

OVER AND OVER

Over and over our Master above,
Looks on our work with compassion and love,
Sees our mistakes, and sees how we have tried,
Views our long battle with weakness and pride,
Over and over He pardons our sin,
Open your heart's door, let Jesus come in.

A Temperance Talk to Soldier Boys

At a recent service in the little church at Fort Hancock, N. J., the Rev. William Sweet delivered a powerful sermon on temperance, which was listened to with marked attention by the audience of soldiers. These services are held under the auspices of the Army and Navy Department of the International Committee, Y. M. C. A. In the course of his address, the speaker said:

Statistics show that of the three million children who are born annually of drunken parents, half a million are born idiots, and three hundred thousand are born deaf, dumb, or blind.

In my college days I played football. One fine day in November there came another team from a distant city to play us. Our team was comparatively light, but was extremely fast; and this other team was heavy, averaging fifteen to twenty pounds heavier to a man. But we were confident, relying on our speed and fine physical condition, and we had heard too, that the members of this other team drank. The game began. In the first half they played well, and when it ended the score stood six to six. The second half started, and from its beginning we had things our own way. We tore great holes in their line and circled their ends for big gains, and before the game ended, two of their heaviest men, weighing over two hundred apiece, were carried off the field exhausted, and we won the game by a decisive score. We won, simply because of our better physical condition and training. They were flabby and without endurance, because of drink.

The next reason why a man is not wise who drinks, is because it injures his mind. Many a young man has thus destroyed his chances of becoming a scholar. It destroys memory and wears out the tissues of the brain.

The third reason why a man is not wise who drinks, is because it destroys his happiness. Happiness is the great end in life, for it men strive with unceasing ardor. But happiness can be built only on virtue, and where drunkenness reigns, virtue is a stranger and God an enemy. A drinking saloon in a community means rags and misery for some of its people, and sixty thousand saloons in the nation mean rags and misery multiplied sixty thousand times. Universal happiness and prosperity cannot exist in the same land with the saloon, any more than peace and safety can exist in a sheepfold when the wolf has entered it. A drunkard not only destroys his own happiness, but the happiness of all those around him. Drink destroys homes, makes criminals out of children and destroys a country's happiness.

Another reason is that it destroys his chances for heaven. "A drunkard cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." A drunkard not only suffers misery here on earth, but he will have eternal misery in the world to come. Why, then, will a man drink? I have never found a man who drank say that liquor brought him anything else but misery. Drink destroys a man's health, it robs him of his mind, it drives happiness from him, it sends him to hell.

But these are only some of the personal reasons why a man should not drink. There are many other reasons we might give against this drink habit. One is it destroys innocent life. Railroad companies recognize this danger, and will not employ a man who drinks. Not long since, on one of the great railroads in this country, a wreck occurred because of a drunken switchman; and I would venture to say a great proportion of the wrecks are caused directly or indirectly by drunken employees. Then drink undermines society. Intoxication goes with every crime; a drunkard is qualified for every vice. A judge once said, "there is scarcely a crime brought before me that is not, directly or indirectly, caused by strong drink."

Let me give to you what different men have said of this habit of drinking and drunkenness. William Penn once said, "All excess is ill, but drunkenness is of the worst sort. It spoils health, it dismounts the mind, and unmans men. It reveals secrets, is quarrelsome, lascivious, impudent, dangerous and mad. He that is drunk is not a man."

There is a Japanese saying that goes something like this: "A man takes a drink, then the drink takes a drink, and the next drink takes the man."

John B. Gough has said: "The barroom is a bank; you deposit your money and lose it; your time, and lose it; your character, and lose it; your manly independence, and lose it; your home comfort, and lose it; your self-control, and lose it; your own soul—and lose it."

Whiskey is a good thing in its place. There is nothing like it for preserving a man when he is dead. If you want to keep a dead man, put him in whiskey; if you want to kill a live man, put whiskey in him. Said Franklin, "Some of the domestic evils of drunkenness are homes without windows, gardens without fences, fields without tillage, barns without roofs, children without clothing, principles, morals or manners." Gladstone said, "Intoxicating drinks have produced evils more deadly, because more continuous, than all those caused to mankind by the great historic scourges of war, famine and pestilence combined." "A drunkard is the annoyance of modesty; the trouble of civility; the spoil of wealth; the destruction of reason. He is the brewer's agent, the tavern and ale-house benefactor, the beggar's companion, the constable's trouble, his wife's woe, his children's sorrow, his neighbors' scoff, his own shame. In short, he is a tub of swill, a spirit of unrest, a thing below a beast, and a monster of a man."

ing to his many thousands devoured at a meal. Last came Intemperance, with a face like fire, shouting, "Give way! ye sickly band of pretenders! Am I not your parent? Does not sagacity trace your origin to me? If my operations cease, whence will come your power?" Then the grisly monarch, Death, gave a smile of approval and placed Intemperance at his right hand as his favorite and Prime Minister.

Drink drowns more than the sea, burns up more property than fire, takes more lives than war; it is the prime minister of death.

Death (says an old legend) having occasion to choose a Prime Minister, summoned his illustrious courtiers, and allowed them to present their claims to the office. Fever flushed his cheeks; Palsy shook his limbs; Dropsy inflated his carcass; Gout racked his joints; Asthma half strangled himself; Colic pleaded his violence; Plague his sudden destruction, and Consumption his certainty. Then came War, with stern confidence, allud-

other institution. Every Thursday afternoon he preaches in the jail, and assists in a service conducted in the "Woman's Wing," by the W. C. T. U. These visits to the jail afford opportunity for conversation with men and women, who spend from one to six months there, and many are influenced for good through the efforts of missionaries and other Christian workers. There are besides these, various services at churches, missions, prayer meetings, etc. Then there is house-to-house visitation, among those in sorrow or distress. The city missionary is never idle. Even when Mr. Grady took a vacation last August, he preached and took part in forty-four religious services in country churches. He would be glad to hear from any one who may be engaged in city missionary, jail or other work similar to his own, as he feels that interchange of thought would be helpful to him.

The Power of the Hague Tribunal

IN view of the steps recently taken by our government for the purpose of bringing about an early reassembling of the Hague Peace Conference, suggested by the recent Peace Conference), and also in view of the reference to the Hague of the North Sea incident, which threatened to result in war between Russia and England, it is of timely interest to know how authorities on international law regard the power and jurisdiction of the Hague court. Can it do more than merely advise? Is there any way in which its findings and decisions can be made obligatory and effective? This is the immediate and important question now before the world.

In a recent address at Mohonk, N. Y., J. B. Moore, a distinguished authority on international law and for many years connected with the State Department in Washington, said:

"The Hague Tribunal is a judicial, not a legislative, body. How, then, are we to establish a reign of peace on earth? It seems to me that the first thing that must do is to establish a system under which the necessary force in human affairs may be applied without going to war. We know how it is in our municipal governments, in our own national affairs. We must keep a certain number of policemen in proportion to the population. In doing so we merely recognize, and necessarily recognize, the existence in human nature of an aggressive element. There are good men and bad men; there are just men and unjust men; there are unaggressive and aggressive men; so that we must maintain some police force for the purpose of curbing and keeping in order those who are disposed to violate the rights of others. Now in international affairs we have the same fundamental facts to deal with, the facts of human nature; but we have not yet reached that stage of international organization in which some acknowledged force can be used for the purpose of preventing wrong, and at the same time preventing war.

"At the present day, if two nations go to war, one against the other, one may make a conquest of the other's territory. We may convert a war of defense to a war of aggression in that way, and yet it is perfectly legal, according to the present code of international law. What we must do, is to find some way to ally as between nations a legal system, similar to that which exists in every civilized state. It may be said that that is no more or less of a dream; and so it is. Our ancestors, when they were wandering in the forests under their tribal chieftains, I suppose would have treated the feudal organization as a dream; and as the followers of the feudal chief would be treated the modern international status as a dream. It was something that they simply could not conceive of being in into practice.

"There are two ways, as it seems to me, in which some international force might be employed for the purpose of conducting international relations under a system of law. We might have, perhaps, a system under which penalties would be applied to any nation that showed a disposition to do wrong, or actually committed a wrong; all nations might concur in inflicting certain penalties. But there is yet another plan more comprehensive than that, and that is the organization of a sort of international force which should be under the control of an International Council. This International Council would consider the question of justice between nations, determine which was in the right and which was in the wrong, and if the nation which was conceived to be in the wrong were recalcitrant, then, under the orders of the International Council, the international force would be employed for the purpose of restraining the nation that was disposed to inflict an injury.

"Even though nations are not every day resorting to the Hague Tribunal for the settlement of their differences, yet, its very establishment, a step was taken towards a permanent international tribunal, that may be able almost wholly to prevent wars between nations."

Little Journeys Among the Arabs

ARCHIBALD FORDER is a missionary traveler and explorer, who has spent many years in Arabia, and whose writings concerning that strange, wild people and their country, are of great interest and importance that Mr. Forder has come to be regarded as authority on the subject. Several years ago he penetrated into the heart of Arabia, alone, where he had many adventures and endured unusual hardships. He has done for his untraveled land what Livingstone did for the "unknown continent" of Africa, opening it up to the knowledge of the civilized world, and throwing much light upon its life and their customs.

From Mr. Forder's latest book Among the Arabs in Tent and Town, we are privileged to make a few interesting extracts:

Coming from Kerak, Moab, he saw this stern picture of Arab life: I must tell you how busy I have been since I returned, and what dreadful things have taken place. Last Wednesday night took place between some Mujellis and the next to the Skour; two brothers, sons of Sheikh Khalil, were murdered, not killed in fair fighting, but captured and killed in a barbarous manner. These two were our best friends among the Mujellis, so that it is to us a really serious loss. Besides these, two more, sons of Sheikhs, and two girls, as well, were killed. On Thursday morning the sad news was brought, and at once men, women, and children were in the wailing, strong men crying like children from grief. Two hours later the bodies arrived loaded on camels; the sight was one I shall never forget, and the grief of the women cannot be described. When the bodies arrived, I stood by and saw all the wounds; it was a fearful sight; such butchery I never want to see again.

During these proceedings and the funeral following, a man came that I should at once go out to the tents to see a wounded man, son of one of the Sheikhs, a cruel man. At first I refused, as a boy only was to go with me, and the country is in such a disturbed state, the Skour being bold enough to come into Kerak territory; the Sheikh then said, "Wait until the morning and I will go with you myself." In the morning we started at six o'clock, taking plenty of rifles, etc., with us. After four hours' ride we reached Kerak, and I found the poor fellow dreadfully wounded; he had up spear and sword wounds, and made him comfortable. In the afternoon the head Sheikh, who had lost his sons, came from the city, accompanied by all the other Sheikhs; they did all they possibly could to make me comfortable, killed a sheep for me, and kept me well supplied with coffee and milk. I slept with them that night, and the following day returned to the city to get more suitable quarters. This family of Mujellis, who have been so cruel to me and Mrs. Lethaby, now swear eternal friendship, and they think they would not hurt a hair of our heads. I am glad that I have been used of God for their good; continue to pray for them, especially that they may accept the Gospel.

I desired to go to Jowf, a large Arab town, the largest and most important in Northern Arabia. The Chief, whose name was Mohammed-el-Bady, sent for the man in charge of the caravan. He soon came, and was told that I wanted to go with them to the Jowf. Would they provide me a man and let me journey with them? The man at once saw me as a Christian, and gave his answer. "If I took a man to the Jowf, I am afraid Johar (the Chief there) would have me killed for doing such a thing," said he, "so I can't do it."

Other men were called in, but all gave nearly the same answer. One said to me, "If ever you want to see the Jowf you must turn Moslem, as no Christian would be allowed to venture many days." This was somewhat discouraging, but the Chief told me to "keep my heart strong" and we tried again in the morning before they started. Then the matter dropped and I introduced the Bible. A man present, being a good reader, took the Book and began to read. I found him the third chapter of John's Gospel, and as he read a verse I would speak on it.

They asked me lots of questions about the religion and customs of the Christians, pitied us because we could only have one wife at a time, and because we had no date palms in our country. Before separating for the night the man that had been reading for us asked me to give him a Bible. I told him he must buy it. He said he could pay for it in dates if I would take payment that way. I agreed, so next morning he brought me some dates and took away his book.

I saw them leave next morning and wondered if ever I should get away. After they had gone, Mohammed, my host, came to me and said, "As no one will take you with them I will go with you to the next place named Ithera, and perhaps from there you can get on to the Jowf." About noon he called one of his servants to bring in a camel and his horse, and we were to make a start.

At Ithera on the way to Jowf, he had a stirring experience:

A man came, by whose dress I knew must be a stranger. He soon proved it by walking over to me, putting out his hand and shaking mine. Never in my life was a proffered hand more acceptable than that. It spoke in a very assuring way of sympathy, pity, and comfort. He sat down beside me, and then followed this short, but to me instructive, conversation in an undertone:

Stranger.—Who are you and from where do you come?
Answer.—From Jerusalem. I am a Christian, a preacher.

Question.—What do you want here?
Answer.—I am come to see the land, people, towns, villages, and have with me books for sale.

Stranger.—If you value your life you will get out of this as quickly as you can, or the men, who are a bad lot, will kill you.

Question.—What kind of a man is the Chief?
Stranger.—Very kind, and has great influence; makes much of his guests.

Question.—Who are you and what do you do here?
Stranger.—I am a Druze, and have the only shop here. I am allowed to remain here because I pretend to be a Moslem.

With this he got up and went away, and I saw him no more during my short stay there. I then pricked up my ears to hear what the men at the far end of the room were saying. I heard them discussing with the Chief plans for getting rid of me, one man offered to cut my throat whilst I was sleeping that night. But the old Chief said, "I will not have the blood of a Christian on my house and town." Another suggested that the supper that was given me should be poisoned; that would save them killing me, as I should die in my sleep; then I could be buried, and if anyone from my people or Government came looking for me (as they would) my grave could be shown, and, if necessary, my body, but no marks would be seen to show that I had been done away with. To this, however, the Chief objected, and it was suggested that I be driven out into the desert to die of hunger and thirst. It was at last settled that I be left until the morning, and the old Chief said, "Lest any harm come to our beasts by having a Christian with them, he had better spend the night in the gardens under the palms." Then I was called to follow the chief, and he led me out into the gardens.

After many hairbreadth escapes, he reached the Jowf in safety. His story continues:

I came upon Johar, the Chief, holding his daily Court of Inquiry. He was mounted on a dais about three feet high, with his scribe at his side. Before him in a semicircle sat scores of men listening to the various cases presented to him to give judgment about. On seeing me, he beckoned me to him, and asked me to sit by his side. He finished the case he had in hand, and then turned to me, "Did you come over here alone?" "Yes." "Were you not afraid?" "No." "Have you no fear of anyone?" "Yes, I fear God and the devil" (a common saying among them). "Do you not fear me?" "No." "But I could have your head cut off." "Yes, I know you could; but you wouldn't treat a guest thus." "No," he said, "I wouldn't; but I would Khy-khwan (turning to him), if he were not such an old friend of mine, for bringing you down here with him."

Then, calling one of my neglectful attendants, he told him to return with me to the house, have bread made for me, and see that I was never hungry, "and don't let him go out alone," he bawled out as we departed.

A few days later the crisis came. Chief Johar said:

"You are come into the land of the Moslem, the believers in Mohammed, the prophet of God; here are no Christians, we don't allow them to stay here, we are taught by our religion to kill all such. I must ask you to give up your religion and become as one of us. What do you answer?"

Here was a strait place to be in. With a short, silent prayer to God for words to speak, I replied, "Chief Johar, I would ask you two questions and hear your answers." "Good," he said, "speak." "First, if you were in the land of the Christians, guest with the Queen, and she asked you to become a Christian and give up your own religion, would you do it?" "No, not if she had my head cut off," he replied. "Secondly, which do you think it best to do, to please God or please man?" "To please God," was the ready reply he gave. Then I said, "Johar, I am just like you; I cannot change my religion, not if you cut off two heads if I had them, and I must please God by remaining a Christian. If I repeated 'the witness,' you would all be pleased, but it would only be from here (touching my lips), my heart would still remain Christian, and so by pleasing you I should grieve God by becoming a liar and deceiver. I cannot do what you ask me, it is impossible." He rose and went out much displeased.

I was out in the groves when a man came to call me. I hurried back and found the large guest-room full of men. I was invited to sit by Johar. All were very silent. Then Johar addressed me. "Christian, what I asked you yesterday was a hard thing, and I think there must be things that make it difficult for you to become a Moslem, but I will help you. Are you married?" "Yes."

"Well, listen. If you will become Moslem I will give you four wives instead of one. I will also give you camels, palms and money, so that you can trade and soon become rich. We will give you a house and all you need, if you will become a Moslem as we are."

I thanked him for his kind offer, but told him I could not change my religion for all he might offer to give me. He got up quickly and went away to his castle, murmuring "that it was a cursed day when I came among them, and that if I stayed in the Jowf some harm would befall them." That evening he sent Faleh, his son, to me, requesting that I give him the Bible he had seen. So I sent it to him.

Continuing his narrative, Mr. Forder relates how in spite of many perils he remained in the Jowf many days and disposed of a number of Scriptures in Arabic. The return journey to Jerusalem through the desert was made in safety.

The Child Widows of India

AMONG the Hindus, marriages occur between infants of the tenderest age as arranged for by their parents. The child lives with her father and mother until she and her husband are of reasonable age. If the husband of these so called child-wives dies in boyhood, the poor girl becomes a widow from her babyhood, and is unwittingly destined for the sad life of a widow.

The child widow is not subjected to the full indignities of widowhood until she attains her twentieth year. From that time her troubles begin. The sacred thread which was tied around her neck on her wedding-day is now broken by the other widows of her family. She ceases to wear a jacket, or jewels, or flowers in her hair. She discontinues the use of turmeric at her bath. The red mark is no longer on her forehead, and, in many cases, her long black tresses are removed. In some classes of Brahmin women, the head is even shaved.

From this time their lives are one continued scene of misery. Restricted to the meanest of household duties, they are treated by their nearest relations with contumely and neglect. She is not to sleep on a bed or mattress, but on a piece of mat or carpet. She must not eat more than once a day, and must keep all the fast days, which are twice or three times every week. In the morning, she hides her face, lest her people might see it before they see each other's. If she is accidentally seen, it is a bad omen, and she is punished and abused the whole day.

Sometimes a servant may be allowed to take rest, but a widow never. She takes no rest in any social function, such as weddings, dinner-parties, etc. If guests are invited to the house, she must not talk with them nor smile. If she is sick, no medicine is administered to her by some kind hand. If she is dying, no one whispers words of comfort or consolation. "Let her die! Let her die! Her husband is dead through the ill-luck she has brought him, now what is the use of her living?" This is what they say. Their very loneliness and bereavement, instead of being occasions for sympathy and endearment, only calls forth harsh and brutal treatment as above described, and many a poor, lone child-widow seeks peace and rest in the grave. Hear her lament, as sung by a sympathetic poet:

Low lies my lord in pain on Ganga's shore,
His very blanket trailing in the tide,
So longs my lord, when he shall breath no more,
Straightway in Ganga to be purified.
Spare him, oh Tama, for thy halls are grim, Unfit for one so young and gay as he;
Vishnu! By thy preserving power spare him
From actual death—from living death spare me.

"Wah—Hurree! Hurree!" 'Tis the funeral cry!

My lord is dead, and mine a living grave.
Why did not death choose me? Oh Siva why?
At once a widow and at once a slave—
Come, strip the bangles from my hands and feet,

Shave my poor head in witness of my shame;
Give me coarse clothes to wear, coarse food to eat,

Ignore my presence, and forget my name.
Hush me, if ever I should dare to sing;
Scowl, if at feasts I venture to be gay;
Shrink when I'm near, as from some guilty thing,

And cease your talking till I move away.
Oh, for the day departed, when the fire
Which burned the lord, consumed the widow too!

Dear lord of mine, I'd kiss the flaming pyre
When I could burn and be restored to you—Suttee? The law forbids it! Yet 'twas bliss,
To what we suffer now—alive, yet dead!

Woe to the powers, which, while they save as this,

Left us for outcasts, and for slaves instead.

There are in India, according to the last census (1901), 25,891,936 widows, who suffer more or less as above described. This is one of the blackest shadows cast on Sunny India. That land is waiting for the day when the Sun of Righteousness shall arise, and his beams dispel the darkness that now envelops her womanhood. To bring about this result, she must learn to know her needs. Not education, a better government or social reform; these are good in their way, and may follow. She needs to be taught that the God of Heaven loves his children, and he loves them all alike, however much they may differ in character and position. She needs to be taught the way to the Father and to Jesus Christ. She can only be enlightened in these truths by messengers sent from this and other favored lands.

Let us hope that Lord Tennyson's prayer might be soon realized.

O Father, touch the East, and light
The light that shone when hope was born.

(REV.) H. STEPHENS.

Russia's Finnish General

GENERAL GRIPPENBERG, the new Russian commander in the Far East, though well advanced in years—being over sixty-seven—is still active, standing erect over six feet in height, lithe in figure, of a determined aspect, and at the same time pleasant and courteous in manner, and of strong religious principles; while he has the reputation of being a keen soldier and a daring leader. By birth a Finn of noble descent, after rising to the rank of Lieutenant-General in the Russian army, he was appointed Governor of the department of Viborg, in his native land, which was secured to Peter the Great in 1721 by the treaty of Ustadd. In this position he was one of the first to suffer for his country, when the present Czar, regardless of his oath to maintain the rights and liberties of the Finlanders, determined to merge their nationality into that of Russia, even to the suppression of their language for all official purposes, whether of debate in their legislative assemblies or of pleading in their courts of law. General Gripenberg in his capacity of Governor, refused to carry out an arbitrary order given by the Governor-General of Finland on his own initiative, which was directly contrary to the Finnish Constitution, was summarily dismissed from his post and sent into exile; and had lately been traveling in Italy and Switzerland with his family, pending the permission of the Czar to return to his own home and end his days in peace. The appointment of Gripenberg has been looked upon as a distinct rebuff to Kourapatkin.

Minneapolis' New Mission

THE work of the Scandinavian Union Mission in Minneapolis, Minn., is a new evidence that spiritual life and brotherly love in the hearts of the Christians to-day are not decreasing. There is a very large number of Scandinavians in Minneapolis and the Mission is greatly needed. Thousands of these foreigners of both sexes, especially young people, are to be found there, connected with no church and enjoying no religious privileges. Many have already been led to Christ through the efforts of this mission.

The Scandinavian Union Mission is supported by the young people of different Scandinavian churches in Minneapolis and ever since its beginning, the work has been spiritually successful. It was incorporated August, 1904, and is now endeavoring to raise funds for a building better adapted for carrying on its work on a basis similar to that of the Union City Mission of the same city. It is planned to have a restaurant, lodging-house and reading-room in connection with the work.

His subsequent travels in the land of Moab were attended by many dangers. One odd adventure is worth relating. Mr. Forder had dressed the wounds of a chief, who had been attacked by robbers, and the latter were angry at the missionary's act.

One night I had gone to bed and was asleep in my room all alone. About midnight I was roused by a banging at the door. I called to know what was wanted, because it was so unusual to be disturbed in this way. The answer was, "Open the door or we will break it in, quick." Without formalities I walked three men, their faces covered with handkerchiefs, with only their eyes visible. "We are come to kill you." I walked up to them one at a time, pulled the covering off their faces and recognized them, saying, "You are Bedr, you Mo-mood, and you Salamey," three of the cruellest and most bloodthirsty of our tribe. They were rather surprised at my action. I asked them to sit down, stirred up the ashes on the hearth in the middle of the floor, and soon had a fire going. While I was doing this and making some tea, I had an eye to them. They had daggers and revolvers with them, the latter fully charged as they soon showed me. They made me sit down with them and answer questions. "Why do you go to our enemies?" "Where was the man wounded?" "How did you treat him?" "Will he recover?" and such like, all of which I answered. "In the morning," they said, "you will be found dead here, we shall be away from the city before then, and no one will know who killed you." I told them God would know all about it, as he knew everything. At last they said, "If you will give us each ten mejedies (about £2), we will do you no harm." I soon told them I should do nothing of the kind. They lowered the amount, and finding I still refused they began to threaten. I kept firm, and again they held a conference, the result of which was a demand to be shown the pictures (the magic lantern). They had heard about it and must have a show to themselves. I told them of the trouble to fix up the sheet, etc., but they insisted, so I had to get it out, put up the sheet, and give them an exhibition. They were highly pleased with the pictures, all Scripture subjects, and what I had to say about them, working in all the Gospel I could.

Some of the photographs taken by Mr. Forder are extremely interesting, especially those of the traditional tomb of Aaron, and the grave of the head of the Baptist.

The Outlook in India*

EVER in the history of missions has the outlook in India been more hopeful than now. Statistics recently compiled give the number of Christians as 2,664,313, but in this case do not tell the whole story. A long experience of the Hindu has led the missionaries to exercise increased care as to the genuineness of heart in the converts. The results are, even now, feeling the effects of the mistake made in the early years of missionary labor, of accepting too readily the profession of converts, who, from mixed motives, declared themselves Christians. They are now more careful, there are hundreds—perhaps thousands—of converts waiting for admission, who will in all probability be soon added to the rolls of church membership. In this there are signs of inquiry. There are many districts where the people are ready and eager to listen to the missionary, while in former years he would have to obtain a hearing from them. This is largely due to the noble generosity of the Epworth League for Nov. 27. Matt. 10:1-7.

osity of Christian people during the famines of 1896 and 1900. The people realize that there must be something good in a religion that sent such liberal aid to them in their bitter need. People who were themselves relieved and others who were not in need, but heard of the wonderful benefaction, are asking themselves why it should have been made. They are told that Christianity is a religion of love and they have had proof of the fact. Besides these signs of hopeful inquiry, there is the important fact that soon there will go out from the orphanages of India thousands of Christians, who have been clothed, fed and educated by the bounty of American Christians. They will permeate the people and preach Christianity by their lives. Much may be expected from their influence. Our readers have taken a prominent part in preparing this army of workers for their task and have a right to rejoice in the prospect. The old superstitions, the old indifference to life, will be contrasted with the purity and intelligence of these young people, and a great harvest of souls may be expected in the near future.

THE GRAVE OF STANLEY, THE EXPLORER

England has honored the memory of Sir Henry Morton Stanley at Pirbright, by the erection of a memorial stone, which is shown in the illustration. It was Lady Stanley's wish that the grave of her husband should be marked by some great monolith, formed by nature, and not chiseled by the hand of man. A huge stone was found at Dartmoor, which was utilized for the purpose. It is a great, oblong boulder, formed by the ages, which makes a characteristic and imposing tombstone. It was erected over his last resting place and marked with a suitable inscription in commemoration of the great explorer, whose journeys in "Darkest Africa" were the means of opening up to the world the interior of the unknown Continent and its strange inhabitants.

Missions Hindered by Drink*

THERE has been no spectacle more pathetic than that witnessed a few years ago, of the venerable missionary, Dr. John G. Paton, returning with tears that his work in New Hebrides was being undone by dealers in intoxicating liquor, who were selling the "firewater" to his people. He vainly protested against it, and some expressly to beg the American people to stop the traffic. He said that the chief who had embraced Christianity to him and asked him why it was permitted. "My people," he continued, "commit outrageous crimes when in a drunken state. The liquor is the cause of the destruction of the people. I cannot control them." He knows the symptoms only too well. The effects of the drink which so plagues the chief are familiar to us and have the same difficulty. Wherever the firewater goes it produces the same results. The same results are witnessed in the Hindu and the Mohammedan.

point to the drunken white man and say, "That is a specimen of Christianity. Our religion, whatever you may say of it, prevents such degradation." So the good that is being done by Christian missions on the one hand, is being neutralized by the evil that is being done by the liquor-dealers on the other. Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop pleaded in the same fashion on behalf of women whom she had seen in her travels demoralized and ruined by the same evil. Thanks to persistent effort on the part of temperance people, the open sale of intoxicants to native races is now forbidden, but the smuggling of it still goes on, and at Sierra Leone and other centres the liquor brought for the use of the white man finds its way into native hands. The work of the missionary is hard enough at the best; it is a crying shame that it should be made more difficult by the greed of his own people, who by their example and by their direct act introduce among the people whom he is trying to win for Christ, the vices which are destroying his own people. The responsibility of such traders for thus neutralizing the good work is terrible.

GOOD MANNERS FOR ALL OCCASIONS

By Margaret E. Sangster

Margaret E. Sangster
Family Editor, Christian Herald

This is not an antiquated production, but was written in October, 1904, especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by Margaret E. Sangster, the leading and unquestioned authority on social etiquette. Mrs. Sangster writes for the people, and consequently, "the plain people," as Abraham Lincoln was pleased to call them, can adopt, without doing violence to preconceived notions, the forms for correct manners which she here lays down in simple language.

There is no valid reason why the farmer and his sons should not be gentlemen, or why the artisan's wife and her daughters should not be ladies, so far as deportment concerned, and surely there are none so wealthy or so learned, that they can afford to dispense with the refining and polishing influence of true politeness. Therefore, whether old or young, rich or poor, cultured or uncultured, this excellent work, the latest and best authority on modern etiquette, must appeal to all.

A Limited Number have been Reserved for America
We Control Their Sale Exclusively

THE NOBLEST SUBJECT IN ART

THE history of art is rich in noble subjects and the noblest and vastest is the subject of the present book. It has inspired nearly all the greatest painters and a volume as large as THE GOSPELS IN ART might be published on the pictures that represent even a single theme such as The Good Samaritan, or The Prodigal Son.

THE AIM AND SCOPE OF THE WORK

The aim is to gather within one volume a good selection of works by the great painters from Fra Angelico to the present day so as to form a pictorial companion for The Gospel Story—excluding those pictures which might provoke controversy and give pain or offense in some religious circles. The art represented in this book springs directly from the spirit of the Four Gospels and makes its appeal to all in sympathy with the general Christian attitude to the Life and Teachings of Jesus Christ. Hence the title of the book—THE GOSPELS IN ART.

THE MAGNITUDE OF THE SUBJECT

The subject is so vast that only the greatest artists are well represented; among the lesser of the old masters and among the hundreds of modern painters who have been inspired by the Gospel Story only a few here and there can be chosen and illustrated as a type of many. Even so, more than one hundred and ten painters are represented and the names of the few which we append, will give some idea of the representative character of the book:—Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Bouguereau, Michael Angelo, Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Correggio, Eugene Delacroix, Albrecht Durer, Van Dyck, Holman Hunt, Sir J. E. Millais, J. F. Millet, Munkacsy, Murillo, Puvis de Chavannes, Raphael, Rembrandt, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Salvatore Rosa, Rubens, Andrea del Sarto, Titian, Velasquez, Leonardo de Vinci, and Paul Veronese.

THE MAGNIFICENT NATURE OF THE VOLUME

THE GOSPELS IN ART contains six Rembrandt photogravures—32 special plates in colored monochrome—156 black and white illustrations and more than 200 engravings in half-tone. It contains in all, 280 pages of text and illustrations (8 1/4 x 11 1/2) all printed in the thorough style which cannot fail to win a chorus of praise from press and public.

THE DIVISIONS OF THE VOLUME

THE GOSPELS IN ART is divided into the following sections:

- INTRODUCTION. THE HISTORY OF ART IN ITS RELATION TO THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. By Leonce Benedite, Director of the Luxembourg.
- CHAPTER I. THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS CHRIST. By Henry Van Dyke, D.D., Professor of Literature in Princeton University.
- CHAPTER II. THE MINISTRY OF JESUS CHRIST. By the Right Rev. G. A. Chadwick, D.D., Bishop of Derry and Raphoe.
- CHAPTER III. FROM GETHSEMANE TO OLIVET. By the Rev. Robert F. Horton, M.A., D.D.

Pilgrim Day Memories

IN sharp contrast to our modern Thanksgiving—day of all the year when good cheer abounds—is the first day of thanks given by the weary, but strong-hearted little band of pilgrims who cast anchor in Provincetown Harbor on November 21st, 1620. On the day the first exploring party landed, they had drawn up and signed a contract, agreeing to submit to such government as they should agree by common consent to make and choose. This agreement, which was signed by every member of the party, seems to have been instigated, not only for convenience in determining authority, but as a sort of safeguard against any trouble which might be made by some of the men who were not members of the Pilgrim body proper. There were a number of sailors and adventurers among them, who were tolerated and allowed to make the voyage because of their value as strong, able-bodied men. These men had indulged in "discontented and mutinous speeches" before landing, and their factious spirit was therefore wisely nipped in the bud by the drawing up and signing of what afterward became known as the "Mayflower Compact."

These precautions having been observed, a party went ashore for wood and fresh water. Those who are familiar with the sandy barrenness of the Cape Cod of to-day, may be surprised that the Pilgrims found lying before their eyes a scene thus described:

"A good harbor and pleasant bay, circled round, except at the entrance, which is about four miles over from land to land, compassed about to the very sea with oaks, pines, juniper, sassafras and other sweet wood."

But dreary indeed was everything else that confronted the little group. No friends to welcome them, no inns where they might refresh their weary bodies while holding sweet counsel with each other. Nothing but the cold, bleak New England shore. In speaking of this landing, Bradford says:

"It is recorded in Scripture as a mercie to ye apostle and his shipwrecked company yt ye barbarians shewed them no smale kindnes in refreshing them," but the savages that peopled this wild country were readier to fill their visitors sides with arrows.

The joy and thanksgiving of reaching land must have been very much tempered by the fear of wild beasts and wild men, the cruel, fierce storms and deadly cold weather. Sad, indeed, would have been the hearts of these brave, intrepid men and women, could they have foreseen the immediate future, and the awful hardships which awaited them.

But on this day (November 11th, as they dated it in old style), they were moved to thank God for his mercy in preserving their lives and safely landing them. What a pathetic scene it must have been, as they waded through the waves and wet sand of the shore, and struggled through the scrubby underbrush, always on the watch against a sudden attack from hidden human foes or savage beasts! How keenly alert they were to learn what they could of the country in that region, and how they sought for signs to tell them whether it were safe or expedient to settle in that locality, or push still further on!

This first landing of the Pilgrims, this first day of giving thanks, does not occupy as prominent a place in the history of our country as does the later landing. Provincetown is forgotten in Plymouth Rock, and November 21st gives place to December 21st, 1620, now called Forefather's Day, for on that date, the Pilgrims (who had started from their first harbor in a shallop), set foot on the main shore where Plymouth now is.

The difficulty of obtaining water in the Cape Cod region seems to have been the chief reason why the little band did not settle there, for the soil was good for corn; they had found enough for seed, and the fishing promised to be excellent. In view of the shifting qualities of the sand, and the fact that Provincetown and all the region round about has undergone great changes as to shore line, it is well that our brave forefathers preferred to make their final landing on the solid rock at Plymouth. Solid rock makes a better shrine than treacherous sand. Bitter cold, with high winds and snow, marked the Pilgrims brief stay at Provincetown, and in the light of these latter days, where warmth and comfort abound on every hand, one cannot help but question what these people had to be thankful for. A number never recovered from the exposure they underwent during the freezing cold and storms. "The wading at Cape Cod had brought much weakness amongst us, which increased so every day more and more, and after was the cause of many of their deaths," Bradford pathetically states.

It was sixty-six days out from England, when the ocean-tossed travelers cast anchor in the calm and peaceful harbor of what was afterward to be known as Provincetown, and it was here that the devoted strong-souled men and women "fell upon their knees and blessed ye God of heaven, who had brought them over ye vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all ye perils and miseries thereof again to set their feet on ye firme and stable earth, their proper element."

There were men with hoary hair
Amidst that pilgrim band:
Why had they come to wither there
Away from childhood's land?

There was woman's fearless eye,
Lit by her love's deep truth;
There was manhood's brow serenely high
And the fiery heart of youth.

What sought they thus afar?
Bright jewels of the mine?
The wealth of seas, the spoils of war?
They sought a faith's pure shrine.

And this they found, and this is why all we who celebrate in our beloved home-gatherings Thanksgiving Day, should remember with an added prayer of thankfulness, the long ago Thanksgiving of our brave Pilgrim fathers and mothers in 1620.

From 'Way Down Georgia

Dear Editor: I was born and reared in Edgefield County, S. C.; followed Longstreet, Jackson, Early, and Lee for four long years; came out of the war an unimportant rebel, married a penniless woman, myself penniless, had twelve children by her; married another penniless one when she died, have six children by her; and now, with all that there is left to me, I find myself to-night sitting by my comfortable fireside at 5 o'clock, ruminating—musing—which I am very prone to do in my sixty-seventh year, down here in wire-grass Georgia. I have never had a dollar given to me, never intentionally defrauded a man of one, never committed a disgraceful act toward my fellow-man, never a sin that I did not repent of. Have had a great deal of happiness in life; have been a poor, humble follower of the Lowly Nazarene since I was twelve years old, or rather conscientiously tried to be; have read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD almost since it was published, and have derived more profit and pleasure from it than anything I have ever read, except God's book. Now, for the first time, duty compels me to thank you for it. It may be that these words, even from me, will do you some good as it has done me to write them. I can commend the good, and delight so to do in my old age. I wish I could write like Count Tolstoi, or preach like him. Ought there not to be more lay preaching? His sermon that I have just read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been worth the price of subscription. I believe, yea I know, that God will hear and answer my prayer when I say, May God bless Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I read this over to my boys, and Amon, just twelve years old, said, "You can't find a liquor, or lottery, or Sunday excursion, or other such advertisement in it." God bless you. Your old friend and brother. A. C. S. Oswald, Ga.

Thanksgiving of the Homeless

How the Bowery Mission Will Gladden the Hearts of the Eastside Poor

hotel, restaurant or boarding-house, and many a sigh will go up from hearts yearning for the old home and the dear ones gathered in the family circle.

But what about the wretched poor, those who have not even the semblance of home either in city or country, some of whom came perhaps only a year ago to this great city, hopeful and sure of the employment they had reason to believe awaited them? Discouraged and dismayed at their lack of success, their little store of money dwindling until the last penny has gone, they part with their few valuables one by one for enough to buy a bed in a cheap lodging house, leaving a few cents, perhaps, for something to appease their hunger.

Hungry and cold, the man wanders up and down the streets. Is there any thanksgiving for him? Is there any thanksgiving for the man who a little further down the path of wretchedness staggers out from the brilliantly-lighted saloon, where warmth takes the chill out of his bones and cheap whiskey puts false strength into his chilled and despairing heart? Is there any Thanksgiving for this man? Perhaps there is a waiting wife and hungry children not far distant, is there any thanksgiving for them? Yes, for on Thanksgiving morning, the old Bowery Mission will be the Mecca to which many a hungry pilgrim will repair. The good news has reached one hundred poor families of the East Side, that a basket packed with substantial food will be given out to those who have been invited to come and receive it. What gladness the dinner baskets will bring to one hundred different families, only the man who has been out of work or the widow with a hungry flock of little ones about her can know. Each of these baskets will contain a six-pound fowl, two large loaves of bread, one pound of coffee, two quarts of potatoes, the same of turnips, one half pound of butter, one pound prunes, one can of condensed milk, one half-pound of tea, and one pound of sugar.

Few there are who cannot spare a little for the poor, many of whom look forward to the day with sinking hearts, and for the still poorer ones whose hearts are hardened against all that is good. A good Thanksgiving dinner may renew life and infuse strength into the fading efforts of some of these men to obtain work; it may be the turning point for many a weary soul, who finds that there are friends to help him, even after he had ceased to look for them. Let us drop something in the way of superfluous luxury from our well-spread tables if necessary. The price of that something, which we would not miss, might pack a basket for a poor family, or furnish dinners for two or three hungry men who will come to the Bowery Mission on Thanksgiving Day, and whom we cannot send away empty-handed. All who desire to aid in this Thanksgiving charity may do so by sending their contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for that purpose.

The Recent Fires at Erzeroum

ERZEROUH, TURKEY, October 11. To the Editor of "The Christian Herald": On behalf of the missionaries in Erzeroum, I would ask you to correct a misstatement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 21, to the effect that the fires which destroyed the girls' school last January, and the boys' school in August, were both the result of Moslem fanaticism. The latter, we think was undoubtedly of accidental origin; the former, in all probability, was due to an outside cause, but we have no reason to believe that Moslem fanaticism was the motive that influenced the incendiary, if such there was.

Dr. Cuyler's Recollections

Reminiscences of More than Half a Century of an Active Ministry

EIGHTY years of useful, active life! What a treasury of stirring recollections that period covers. How many events, how many memories of eminent workers are included in it. Dr. Cuyler has rendered a welcome service to the public in giving them, in his own words, in his Recollections of a Long Life. They are told very modestly, with sparse references to his own services and with genial recognition of those of others. The time will come when this autobiography will need to be supplemented by a volume, telling the story of his life, as New York and Brooklyn have seen it, a life of patient, cheerful devotion to duty, a life of manly service and vigorous work for all good and beneficent enterprises that a Christian pastor could give. Dr. Cuyler writes as an observer, and from his octogenarian watch-tower, he gives us a cheerful and inspiring view of the past and shrewd observations on our present situation. It is a bright, breezy story, by no means the lugubrious monotone over the good old times that we shall see no more, but the ardent, optimistic outlook of a man who has kept abreast of his times and has preserved the freshness of spirit that at eighty years of age takes an intelligent interest in the events of the day.

He was born, he tells us, at Aurora, N. Y., in 1822. It is a strange picture that he gives of the conditions of life in New York State at that time:

There was not a single railway in the whole State. When I went away to school in New Jersey, the tedious journey by the stage coach required three days and two nights, every letter from home cost eighteen cents for postage; and the youngsters pored over Webster's spelling books and Morse's geography by the light of tallow candles, for no gas lamps had been dreamed of, and the wood fires were covered in most houses by nine o'clock on a winter evening.

The boy's early years were clouded by bereavement. His father, a brilliant young lawyer, only twenty-eight years old, died, leaving him to the care of "one of the best mothers that God ever gave to an only son." He was four and a half years old at that time and he went with his mother to a beautiful farm near Aurora, where her father welcomed them to his pleasant home. There was a good library, and plenty of congenial associations for the growing boy. The future stalwart advocate of temperance was early initiated into its principles, for his grandfather, horrified at the prevalence of drunkenness in the early years of the nineteenth century, was one of the first farmers in the neighborhood to banish intoxicants from his premises. The boy signed his temperance pledge when eleven years old, and it is significant that the first public address he ever delivered was at one of Father Mathews' temperance meetings. It will comfort many who are in like circumstances, to read the following admission from a man who has given more than sixty years to the service of Christ:

I cannot name any time, day, or place, when I was converted. It was my faithful mother's steady and constant influence, that led me gradually along, and I grew into a religious life under her potent training, and by the power of the Holy Spirit working through her agency.

After careful training he was sent to Princeton, without having decided on any definite career. His mother cherished the hope that he would become a minister, but there were many inducements for him to follow his father's career, and among others, an offer from his paternal grandfather, to bequeath to him a valuable law library, which his mother delicately declined on his behalf. It was eighteen months after his graduation from Princeton that he attended a prayer service, and there his decision was made. He spoke for a few minutes, and at the end of the meeting several persons came to him and told him that his talk had done them good. On his way home, the thought came to him that if his talk had helped some souls, it might be well if he preached all the time. His good mother's joy, when he told her of his resolve, may be imagined.

The young student returned to Princeton to take his theological course in the Seminary. During the following three years, he says, he made it a rule "to go out as often as possible and address little meetings in the neighboring school-houses. On the vexed question of written or extemporized sermons, Dr. Cuyler has this to say:

My own observation and experience has been that no rule is the best rule. Every man must find out by practice which method he can use to the best advantage, and then pursue it. No man ever fails who understands his forte, and no man succeeds who does not. Some men cannot extemporize effectively if they try ever so hard; there are others who, like Gladstone, can think best when they are on their legs and are inspired by an audience. During the first few years of my ministry I wrote out nearly the whole of my sermons. . . . After a time I acquired the habit of writing a portion of the sermon, and turning away from the manuscript to interject thoughts that came in the heat of the moment, and then turn to the manuscript. This was generally the habit of Henry Ward Beecher. After thirty years in the ministry I discarded writing sermons entirely, and adopted the plan of preparing a few heads on a sheet of note paper. . . . I remember once asking Mr. Spurgeon if he wrote his sermon out. His answer was, "I had rather be hanged." His sermons were prepared in a very short time. He said, "If I had a month assigned me for preparing a sermon, I would spend thirty days and twenty-three hours on something else, and in the last hour I would make the sermon; and if I could not do it then I could not do it in a month."

From 1853 to 1860 Dr. Cuyler was pastor of the Market Street Presbyterian Church, New York, and in April of 1860 he began his ministry in the Lafayette Avenue Church, Brooklyn which was to continue thirty years. He does not tell us much of those years of faithful ministry. He dwells much on the need of pastoral visitation, and urges all young ministers to practice it for various reasons. Especially with the sick and those in trouble should the pastor be at hand. In this way, he says, "I could tell whether or not the shots from the pulpit were striking; for the gunnery that hits no one is not worth the powder."

The most interesting part of Dr. Cuyler's book, is the account of his association with distinguished men. He knew personally many of the great statesmen of his time, most of the literary celebrities, as well as the most famous preachers here and abroad. Of all these he has good stories to tell. His comments are altogether kindly and appreciative, and it is easy to read between the lines that the acquaintance was mutually agreeable. He knew intimately Horace Greeley, Whittier, Benjamin Harrison, Gough, Finney, Dr. Tyng, Dr. Schaff, Moody and Beecher on this side the Atlantic; and, on the other, Gladstone, Lord Shaftesbury, Dean Stanley, Carlyle, Dickens, Wordsworth, Spurgeon, Parker and McLaren. Characteristic stories of all these abound in his volume. We have room for only one, which he heard from the poet Whittier:

Underneath his grave and shy sobriety flowed a most gentle humor. He could tell a good story, and when he was describing the usages of the Quakers in regard to speaking in meeting, he told us that sometimes the voluntary remarks were not quite to the edification of the meeting. It once happened that a certain George C—grew rather wearisome in his exhortations, and his prudent brethren, after solemn consultation, passed the following resolution: "It is the sense of this meeting, that George C—be advised to remain silent, until such time as the Lord shall speak through him more to our satisfaction and profit." A resolution of that kind would not be out of place in some ecclesiastical assemblies I wot of.

The sprightliness, vivacity and shrewd common sense of this volume, show how lightly Dr. Cuyler's eighty years sit upon him. He tells us that his pen is still busy, and he still speaks and preaches occasionally. We may hope that his life will be prolonged to be the comfort and adviser of his host of friends.

Fixing Responsibility

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHENEVER a land grievously sins, every individual in that land either increases or lessens the national sin: every man and woman has a share of responsibility for the drinking customs, the many deaths through drink, the immense populations in workhouses, lunatic asylums and prisons which in large part are due to drink. Everyone who, by his or her example, strengthens this national corruption through drink, must some day give account to God for his or her share in the evil and in the loss of life to soul and body caused by this great evil.

Woe to the crown of Pride, the drunkards of Ephraim." This was the northern country, Israel; at this time hurrying to its doom, marked by God for captivity, and already in part taken captive. The utterly low moral tone of the country is manifest in that, with the enemy at the door, instead of humbling themselves before their God, they can be spoken of as "drunkards of Ephraim." Like priest, like people: "the watchmen," who are also called "shepherds"—i.e., rulers—are blind: they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber" (Isa. 56:10). What a picture. The people will forget their danger in drink; the rulers, when the danger is imminent, instead of coming to their God, who alone can save them, give themselves up to sleep! Ruler a people doing everything to forget or ignore the certain evil which is upon their heels. And why? Because they know not, they will not know their God, at they have not manliness to face their danger.

And what is at the root of all this? Self-indulgence. What leads a man to become a drunkard? Self-indulgence. What hinders those who are interested in the traffic, from nobly sacrificing themselves for their fellow-creatures and their country's good? Self-indulgence! Self-indulgence, and nothing must stand in the way of their gratification. Ignoble, unworthy, contemptible beings are men and women who have come to this! "Yea, they are greedy dogs, which can never have enough, and they are shepherds which cannot understand; they all look to their own way, everyone for his gain from every quarter." And these were the rulers of Israel! These were the men who set the example which the people only too truly followed. "Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant" (Isa. 56:10-12). And thus, when the trouble came, it found them wholly demoralized and unprepared.

But again, what a picture this is of the responsible parties in Israel! They were blind. Who blinded them? The god of this world blinds the minds of them that believe not (2 Cor. 4:4); and those who uphold the drink traffic equally with those who are its miserable victims, are blind. Others can see the destruction ahead of them; and they see it not. But God has sent his witnesses "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God" (Acts 26:18). It is that which a man can do who has his eyesight—to be eyes to the blind. God keep us from despising the despicable, seeing we have been redeemed and rescued from sin as great as theirs! "They are all ignorant." The rulers of a people should never be ignorant; yet the rulers of Israel at this time, who mostly came to the throne by the murder of their predecessors, were men who were neither by birth nor education fitted for the position. And, least of all, did they know and understand either their own hearts or the God of Israel.

Then they were dumb dogs; they would not bark. A dog which cannot bark is useless to guard a house. These rulers could not keep the house of Israel, which was committed to them; they were "sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber." Dogs which were a nuisance; useless; in the way.

Japan in War-Time

D R. W. C. FORSYTHE, who recently went to Korea as an American medical missionary, writes to his relatives in Osceola, Ia., relating some interesting experience. We are privileged to publish these extracts from one of his letters, dated at Fbe, Japan:

Yesterday we went up to Osaka, the great manufacturing city of Japan, about twenty miles up the bay from Kobe. The principal goods made there is cotton cloth. It has only a million people. I can get supplies here at much cheaper rates than in the United States. I think the Japanese drugs are fairly good. I spent several hours at the military hospital. There were about six thousand sick and wounded soldiers there. It is situated at the Exposition grounds, where the Japanese National Exposition was held last year, the buildings left standing being used as wards. In one of these, eight hundred sick and wounded were placed, the beds being laid very close together, and yet, on account of the very high ceilings, having plenty of air space. The cots were of wood, and had very comfortable mattresses, with covers of cotton cloth, padded with cotton batting, making a light and yet comfortable resting. The wards were very clean. The Japanese nurses, with their queer caps and white uniforms, seemed to be very efficient. The doctors were all Japanese. Some, I understand, were educated in Germany. In one of the wards I saw some cases of beriberi, a peculiar disease from which the soldiers are suffering. The officers said they had one thousand cases of beriberi in the hospital, and were losing one or two cases every day. The troops in Manchuria are suffering from it very much.

Although there were some six thousand patients in the hospital, and patients coming in being discharged regularly, there was very little confusion. In Osaka, another hospital accommodates some three hundred cases—men wounded in the head and limbs mostly. One poor fellow was wounded in the head and had both arms in slings and bandages. In these hospitals, the grim horrors of the war were brought home. We used a train-load being brought in from the front, having received the first treatment at the field hospitals. I think the Japanese hospitals will compare very favorably with our own military hospitals. We saw some of the Japanese soldiers on the march. They were an intelligent and vigorous lot of men.

From Osaka I went to Kyoto, the old capital of Japan. Many temples were there. A lantern procession composed of young boys, dressed as soldiers, came down to the station to cheer up the soldiers. They had a very military look, and marched in good time. It looks as if Russia will have a hard time to whip Japan, there is such a vast army coming on to fill up the ranks.

Kobe is quite a large port. We went up on a hill back of the city and got a fine view of the bay. In the groves along the road are many Shinto shrines, all having a peculiar T-shaped entrance. We watched the worshippers for awhile. Young girls would come and pass quickly to the different shrines of marriage, wealth, etc., offering a handful of rice, ringing a little bell, and clapping their hands together twice to wake the god up; then they would bow their heads, say something and pass on to another shrine, and repeat the same performance. One poor woman in great distress of mind and sorrow, passed to nearly every shrine and uttered her prayer with much feeling. The poor woman, however, seemed to get very little comfort from the god, and went away in as great sorrow as she came. It was pathetic to see them bowing down to gods made by men. Sometimes the worshippers would shake a box until a number would come out, and this would correspond to a prayer on a piece of paper.

Mission work is very encouraging in Japan. I talked to a bright young student of the Imperial University of Tokio, who expressed much admiration for America, and said it was his desire to become a Christian. He had been taught by some missionary. Everywhere, people are open to the Gospel, and the truths taught are bearing fruit. Now is the time to seize the great opportunity opened by the war, and use it for the advancement of Christian work. When will the church wake up and do something? The Christian men in the Japanese army and navy have taken a high place. Six Y. M. C. A. secretaries are with the Japanese troops, just as the Y. M. C. A. is with the United States troops. If the churches will only meet the great need and pour workers into Japan right away, there will be a great harvest in the near future.

THIS is the "Champion Boy" of the State of Washington. His name is Harry Ireland. The smile on his face is due to the fact that he had in his pocket a check for $25 from THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

THIS $25 is in addition to the regular commission he receives week after week for selling THE POST.

HARRY is a hustler. The long strip of paper he holds in his hand is covered with closely written signatures of people who have instructed him to deliver THE POST for four consecutive weeks.

HE PERSUADED several prominent business men to sign at the top of the sheet and their names influenced others to sign until the list became longer than he is tall.

THIS is one of the many ways we have suggested to help boys to sell THE POST. It makes the work so easy that thousands of boys have taken it up. Some are making $10 to $15 a week after school hours.

"The Heart of the World," by Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D., Begins in this Issue

has reached far and wide. Everywhere in millions of homes there is a regard for it which cannot be shaken. Sapolio has done much for your home, but now for yourself—have you ever tried that “Dainty Woman’s Friend”—HAND SAPOLIO, for toilet and bath? It is a soap that puts the luxurious bathing of millionaires within reach of the masses.

A BEAUTIFUL SKIN can only be secured through Nature’s work. Ghastly horrid imitations of beauty are made by cosmetics, balms, powders, and other injurious compounds. They put a coat over the already clogged pores of the skin and double the injury.

DELICATE ENOUGH FOR THE BABY. A luxury for everybody. Necessary to every wash-stand. Assists the most elaborate toilet. An exemplification of the luxury of cleanliness. Imparts the vigor and life sensation of a Turkish bath. Energizes the whole body, bringing a glow and exhilaration.

HAND SAPOLIO neither coats over the surface, nor does it go down into the pores and dissolve their necessary oils. It opens the pores, liberates their activities, but works no chemical change in those delicate juices that go to make up the charm and bloom of a healthy complexion. Test it yourself.

THE PERFECT PURITY of HAND SAPOLIO makes it a very desirable toilet article; it contains no animal fats, but is made from the most healthful of the vegetable oils. It is truly the “Dainty Woman’s Friend.” Its use is a fine habit.

Do you want a clear and healthy Skin?

“REALLY TRULY,” as the children say, there is more good and less harm in HAND SAPOLIO than in any toilet soap on the market. Other soaps chemically dissolve the dirt—HAND SAPOLIO removes it. Other soaps either gloss over the pores of the skin or, by excess of alkali, absorb the healthful secretions which they contain.

THE FIRST STEP away from self-respect is lack of care in personal cleanliness: the first move in building up a proper pride in man, woman, or child, is a visit to the bathtub. You can’t be healthy, or pretty, or even good, unless you are clean. Use HAND SAPOLIO. It pleases every one.

WOULD YOU WIN PLACE? Be clean, both in and out. We can not undertake the former task—that lies with yourself—but the latter we can aid with HAND SAPOLIO. It costs but a trifle—its use is a fine habit.

BY A METHOD OF ITS OWN, HAND SAPOLIO cleans the pores, aids the natural changes of the skin, and imparts new vigor and life. Don’t argue, Don’t infer, Try it! It’s a lightning change from office to parlor with HAND SAPOLIO.

The Daintiest Soap Made is Hand Sapolio

—The only soap that makes every pore respond, and energizes the whole body. It is a necessity to every man, woman, and child who would be daintily clean. Keeps you fresh and sweet as a sea breeze; prevents sunburn and roughness. Make the test yourself. Its use is a fine habit—its cost but a trifle.

INDIAN SCHOOL, NORTH CANADA

Canada's Indian Problem

By AUBREY FULLERTON

WITH many new races, bringing each year new missionary problems and responsibilities, Canada has still its first settlers and the necessity of giving them the Gospel. In Canada, as in the United States, the red man is a national ward, cared for, protected, educated, and evangelized by government and church.

There are 108,000 Indians in Canada. They are widely scattered and are found in every province from the ocean to the other, but are most numerous in British Columbia, the Northwest, and northern Ontario. It is no longer necessary to speak of the "poor Indian," for these Canadian red men have property valued at more than $24,000,000, and earn each year an income of $4,000,000. A trust fund held by the government, being chiefly the proceeds of sales of Indian lands, now amounts to over $4,000,000, and a portion of this, together with an annual grant by Parliament, is set aside for their supervision and education. The rest of the burden falls on the churches.

On the whole, the Canadian Indians are making material progress. There are still the shiftless wanderers, the dwellers in huts, who hunt and trap as of old, defying anger and game laws alike; but a majority are settled laborers. On the Pacific coast they are fishermen; in the Northwest they are miners and ranchers; in the eastern provinces they are farmers, skit-makers, and berry-pickers. They live mostly in reserves, in which they have their own Indian villages, with neat white houses, a little church, and sometimes a school.

To change these sons of the wilderness into farmers and settled workers was a transformation indeed; but the first step to it was to free them from their load of paganism. It has been a long story. Nominally at least the Canadian Indians are no longer pagans. Of the total 108,000, all but 12,000 have espoused Christianity, and the still pagan tribes are confined to the remotest and wildest regions. Of professed converts there are about 65,000, divided almost equally between the Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches. Among these are many instances of simple faith and sincerity of purpose.

The Gospel that is given to the Indian is a practical one. It means a cleansing of his house as well as of his heart, and it is being preached to him not only in churches but in schools. Indeed, what the Indian of the future is to be depends very largely upon the schools, for the churches alone will not save him. There are, in Canada, 224 day schools for Indians, forty-five boarding schools, and twenty-three industrial schools, with an enrollment of 10,000 pupils. Most of these schools are denominational, conducted as a part of the missionary work of the churches, and the results are, on the whole, encouraging.

Most is hoped for from the boarding and industrial schools, some of which have already transformed the life of their communities. They are interesting places. The largest of them have farms in connection, where the Indian boys are trained in the art of making themselves useful; carpenter and blacksmith shops to give learn, but they are also quick to forget. Yet year by year some gain is made.

Another disappointment to the people of Canada is that the Indian seems incapable of becoming a citizen. He has grasped the white man's lesson in nearly all but the spirit of citizenship, and in that and in self-dependence he still is lacking. Greatest of all difficulties met with by the Canadian missionaries is the liquor traffic. Still another discouragement is that civilization seems not to be suited to all of the tribes. In the Northwest Territories, the substitution of life in houses for the free, open life of the prairie, together with the other changes in manners and methods of living, has brought about a deplorable prevalence of consumption in several of the local tribes! The Indian population on the whole, however, is gradually increasing.

With all these discouragements, and they are not inconsiderable, Christian work among the Indians of Canada is hopeful and fruitful. The schools are increasing yearly in influence; there is a gradual improvement in sobriety and morality; the Sabbath is receiving better observance than ever before; and, more than all, the Gospel is being heard and understood by an increasing number of young and old. Necessarily, the work is slow; but, compared with a few generations ago, a great and remarkable advance has been made. The light is coming in, and ignorance, superstition and indifference are passing away. The red-man is no longer a savage; he is rather as a child beginning to learn, and the lesson set before him is the simple lesson of faith and love and Christian worship.

What the missionaries think of the work, and how the Indians themselves appreciate it, are both suggested in a recent letter from one of the missionaries in British Columbia: "The future looks bright. We have labored long and . . . hope to see the fruit. The other day I received a letter from one of my Indian pupils, in which he says: 'May God bless the work in the West Coast, and may the time soon come when they will know the Way, the Truth, and the Life. We thank Him, for He has guided us and helped us with our work. Your friend, Klatsawa George.'" A. F.

them a start in mechanics; and some have small printing shops. The girls are instructed in household affairs, such as cooking, washing, knitting and sewing. A liberal common school education is given both boys and girls, with daily Scripture study and religious instruction. From these schools goes out the leaven that is to reach the real life of the Indian people.

There are discouragements. If it were possible to begin with a new generation, independent of past connections, there would be hope of a speedier transformation; but there is a long-seated prejudice and indifference to overcome at home. This is the problem—to prevent the Indian pupil, after leaving school, from reverting to the ways of his fathers. The young people are quick to

General Booth's Daughter to Lead

ON Christmas Day, 1865, a daughter was born to General Booth, founder of the Salvation Army. The Army was then in its infancy, and the proportions which it assumed a few years later were as undreamed of as that the little girl would become the leader of one of its greatest branches. Among the Army's earliest and best recruits were Commander Booth's own children, and he has often been heard to say that he wished there had been eighty instead of eight. The little girl who was born on that Christmas Day was the seventh child, and was named Evangeline, and since her early girlhood she has taken a deep interest in the work of the Salvation Army. Clad in the red-and-blue uniform, this young woman did not hesitate to go into the slums of East London. She was a pretty though fragile creature, and when, in her sweet voice, she sang the songs of her own composition, she touched all hearts and acquired a lasting hold on the affection and confidence of her hearers. So very earnest was she in all that she said and did, that when she sang, her voice appealed to the drear hopelessness of the slum-dwellers more forcibly than any preaching could have done. But the London poor did not always love the Army, and had its own unpleasant ways of expressing its disapproval. Yet, with all her winsome girlishness, Eva Booth never lacked courage. None of the riotous proceedings, either in halls or streets, ever terrorized this young soldier of the Cross. At one time, when a howling missile-throwing mob was unusually threatening, and when she and her little band of devoted followers became the target for vile words and missiles of all descriptions, Eva Booth turned to the leader—a young, bottle-throwing rough, who was doing his best to incite the mob to still greater violence—and appealed to him to protect her. Such tactics surprised the young desperado, and he called off the crowd, and actually escorted the young woman and her terrified companions to a place of safety. Not long after, when she fell the same young ex-rioter brought her a bunch of bla Hamburg grapes, which he had pawned his only coat buy.

After a long and hard apprenticeship at street-singing and speaking, Miss Booth was assigned to a more important position, which involved much traveling. After recovering from an illness, brought on by too close application to work, she was appointed Field Commissioner and traveled over the United Kingdom, with a staff of assistants, holding meetings in the principal cities and towns. She was very successful in this work.

In 1896, Miss Eva made her first visit to the United States. Early in December of the present year she will assume command of the American division of the Salvation Army, taking the place of her brother-in-law, Commander Booth-Tucker, who goes to London. In the last eight years Miss Booth has had command of the Canadian forces, and so well has she filled the position, that her venerable father seems justified in regarding her as his cleverest child. He certainly has a very high opinion of his daughter's executive ability, for the time of the Ballington Booth defection she was given temporary command of the Army in the United States.

It is the general belief among the rank and file of the Salvationists, that under the energetic and level-headed leadership of this devoted woman, the organization will experience a great revival of spiritual interest and an increase of prosperity.

Now is the time to order Premiums. Mail and express facilities are now at their best. Next month will find them congested with the rush incident to the Holiday trade.

The Bowery Mission's 25th Anniversary

NEVER has the old Bowery Mission witnessed a more interesting meeting than that which was held on the evening of Monday, November 7th. The occasion was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Bowery Mission by Mr. A. G. Ruliffson, who passed away several years ago after a remarkable career of Christian service. Mrs. Ruliffson survived him, and she is still warmly interested in the Mission.

Invitations were sent by Superintendent Hallimond to all the old and new friends of the Mission in New York and vicinity, and to converts within reach, to attend the quarter-century anniversary. Nor were the men of the Bowery forgotten. As a result, when evening came, the large hall was packed to its utmost capacity.

It being the eve of the general election, many of the warmest friends of the Mission were out of town, but letters of cordial sympathy were received from them, including the Revs. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.; D. J. Burrell, D.D.; Josiah Strong, D.D.; C. H. Mead, D.D.; W. T. Elsing; F. H. Jacobs; William James; Rev. S. H. Hadley, of Water Street; Bradford Williams; J. B. Devins, D.D., and others.

On the platform sat Mrs. Bird, who, notwithstanding her arduous work among the men of the Bowery for over a dozen years, looked as bright and strong and hopeful as ever. Beside her sat Mr. H. Edwards Rowland, one of the elders of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, who was present at the first meeting when the Mission was founded, and who for many years acted as its Treasurer; Rev. H. S. Jenanyan, of Philadelphia, an Armenian minister, founder of Asia Minor Apostolic Institute, at Tarsus; the Rev. J. J. Munro, chaplain of the Tombs prison; Dr. W. Stewart, Dr. F. E. Caldwell, and many others, were also present.

After some inspiring congregational singing of the hymns "Keep Step With the Master," "Open Wide the Door," "The Solid Rock," and others, a message from Dr. Klopsch, transmitted by telephone, was delivered to the meeting by the Superintendent. The Doctor told how he became interested in the Bowery Mission, some ten years ago. Dr. and Mrs. Talmage, and Dr. and Mrs. Klopsch, had been visiting the Holy Land, and, coming down the Mediterranean, they called at the port of Smyrna, in Asia Minor. On landing there they were met by an English Seamen's missionary, and were asked by him to visit the Mission of which he had charge. They did so, and Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch both spoke to those assembled there. Then the missionary—an ex-sailor—testified that eight years previously he had been a poor, besotted drunkard. His vessel, lying in New York City, he had strolled along the Bowery, and, drawn by the sound of music, he had entered the Bowery Mission and had been savingly converted. Not long after this, being with his ship at Smyrna, he attended a Gospel meeting there, and was induced by the leaders to consecrate his life as a missionary to sailors.

On coming home to New York, Dr. Klopsch found that the Bowery Mission was just then struggling in deep waters financially. He visited the Mission, assured himself of the splendid work it was doing, and promptly assumed the responsibility for its support. Hence the connection of the CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers with this Quarter-of-a-Century Old Lighthouse.

Superintendent Hallimond read a letter from Mrs. Ruliffson (the widow of the founder), in which she wrote:

"Please accept thanks for the invitation to be present at the quarter-century anniversary of the Mission, so long very near and dear to me. It will not be in my power to attend, but be assured of deep interest and earnest prayer.

"It will be just twenty-five years, Nov. 7, since the first meeting, in a small room in the lower Bowery, dimly lighted with a few lamps. My dear husband was leader on this occasion. The few Christians who were there felt assured of the special presence of the Master. Mr. L. P. Tibbals was one of the earliest and most faithful friends of the new enterprise. He is now in heaven. It was in answer to united prayer, that the building No. 36 Bowery was obtained, though for some time refused, and the work became known as 'The Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home,' or 'A Light in a Dark Place,' the second mission in the city to hold services every evening, the first being that of Jerry McAuley in Water Street. Mr. J. W. Childs became an associate leader, and was resident manager of the Home for several years. He was highly esteemed and sincerely lamented. Rev. Mr. Willard, Rev. Sidney G. Law, Chaplain of the Tombs, and many Christian friends were valued helpers, most of whom have been called to the heavenly rest. Fanny J. Crosby, the blind poetess, was present at many anniversaries, and furnished two original hymns for each of these occasions."

Mrs. Ruliffson then went on to record several cases of wonderful conversion which occurred in the early days, including that of Mr. John Parkinson, the sailor's missionary, whom Dr. Klopsch had met in Smyrna. Her letter concluded:

"May the Lord continue to prosper the patrons, workers, and every branch of the work of the Bowery Mission in its witnessing for Christ in our great city."

Mrs. Bird next spoke, giving her recollections of the early days of the Mission, and how, being turned out of her own meeting-place, she was welcomed at the Bowery Mission by Mr. Ruliffson and Mr. Childs. Mr. Edwards Rowland gave an account of the first meeting, and of some wonderful conversions he witnessed in the early days. Rev. H. S. Jenanyan told, how passing through Smyrna many years ago, he visited the Gospel Mission there, and met John Parkinson, the converted sailor. He received from Mr. Parkinson a letter of introduction to the Bowery Mission. He came to New York an entire stranger, with an imperfect knowledge of the language and very lonesome. He was received by Mr. Childs, and lodged for two months in the Bowery Mission, and he gave his first testimony in English from the Mission platform. Under God, he owed nearly everything to the influence of Mr. Ruliffson and the Bowery Mission.

Other addresses were followed by testimonies from converts. There was an abundance of characteristic music, solos by Mrs. Hallimond, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Bryant and Mr. Lawrence, concluding with a touching prayer by Mr. George H. Corfield, of Jersey City.

If the interesting scenes could have been witnessed by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who for the last ten years have so generously aided the Mission work, their hearts would have been gladdened. During the twenty-five years that have elapsed since the opening meeting somewhere between 75,000 and 100,000 men have professedly accepted Christ at the meetings of the Mission!

THANKSGIVING AMONG GOD'S POOR

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

WHEN Martin Carter went to the hospital with a broken leg, and a wound on his head, which came within one of being fatal, his wife and all the little Carters—there were seven of them—were almost inconsolable. Mrs. Carter had often been heard to remark that no matter what happened, "her man" was always to be depended on, and as he never drank, and was such a strong, sturdy fellow, there was little danger of the family suffering, even if coal was high and provisions dear. But now the mainstay had been literally "knocked out." On his way home from work he had slipped and fallen, and a heavy truck wheel had passed over his leg, and his head, coming in contact with the pavement, had been even more seriously hurt. So week after week had passed, and Martin was still a prisoner in the hospital. Thanksgiving Day was drawing near, the little store of money which the prudent couple had managed to lay aside for emergencies was gone. The dreaded rent-day, coming with such alarming frequency, had swallowed most of the savings. It takes such a pitifully short time to spend a little hoard, which has been so long in accumulating. The last dollar had gone to the landlord, and a few days before the day of thanks, Mrs. Carter counted just fifty-seven cents in her little worn purse. There were a few potatoes in the closet, a little oatmeal, and that was all. Mollie the eldest girl, about fourteen, was working for a pittance in a department store as cash girl, and James, the eldest boy, earned a few pennies when he could, running errands, etc. The other five were too small to earn anything, but their appetites were something amazing.

A few days before Thanksgiving, Mrs. Carter gathered her little brood around her and said: "Now, children, we cannot have any Thanksgiving dinner; but that is no reason why we could not give thanks, for we have much to be grateful for. Your father is going to live, so the doctors say. I have not let any of you know how near death he has been, but I have prayed and prayed to God to spare him to us, and the Lord has answered my prayers. The rent is paid; the weather is not so very cold; there is a little left, and almost a half-peck of potatoes in the basket, and as much as two pounds of oatmeal in the bucket. So you see we cannot help being thankful. I have twenty-seven cents in my purse, and that will buy more potatoes, which will last till Mollie is paid again, and I am going to look for more washing to do." But for all her hopeful words, the mother did not succeed in infusing much cheerfulness into the little group gathered about her. The children were willing to give thanks for their father's recovery, but their healthy young stomachs were awfully empty, and that is something hard to submit to, and be thankful at the same time. Little Ben, aged eight, the most rebellious of all, blurted out:

"If I was Tommy Donlan, I would go and get a Thanksgiving dinner, anduff for the whole family. He don't mind goin' beggin' every day, 'n he gets lots 'nuff sight better things 'n we do, too."

"Ben," said his mother, "I wish you would not say such things. David, in the good Book, says, 'Yet have I seen the righteous forsaken, nor seed begging their bread'—so Ben, boy, don't talk of begging, for our father has always been a God-fearing man, and we can claim God's promise."

After their evening prayer, the mother and her little ones retired, comforted by these wise words, and thanking God for the father's improved condition. How delighted will that family be when they receive the invitation from the Bowery Mission to come and get a basket marked for them containing a bountiful Thanksgiving feast. No time will be lost by the boys as they go for the prize, which will excel their most sanguine expectations in its abundance of good, wholesome food, their emergency, they are not beggars, and are willing to work if they could get it to do.

In looking over the list of names and addresses gathered by the Mission from different localities in the poorer parts of the city, we find such notes as these:

- John C. Five in family—man out of work.
- Mrs. H. Large family—husband sick with blood-poisoning.
- Louis M. Nine in family—in great need of food and clothing.
- Mrs. F. A widow—very poor.
- Mrs. G. Blind.
- Mrs. S. Mother, with three small children.
- Mrs. D. Father out of work; eight children.
- Mrs. O'H. Nine children; very poor.
- Mrs. G. Two children; mother just out of hospital.
- Mrs. P. C. Nine children.
- Mrs. H. Sick husband and son.
- Mrs. H. Two children, sick a long time.

Another family with nine children, very poor, father out on strike, and so on down the long list, which tells, in such a fragmentary way, the tragedy of poverty in a big city. One poor widow, with a little baby in arms, and two other children, a girl and boy, is trying to be as cheerful as possible and keep the home together a while longer. How happy they will be, and what a feast they will have, when Joey and Nellie bring in the good basket-full from the Bowery Mission. How Grandma's heart will glow with gratitude as she sits by the old broken stove at sight of the children's bright faces, as they bring one basket for themselves, and one for the Morton's upstairs. Joey shouts as he comes in, "I got a basket for the Morton's upstairs, mother;" and mother says, "I am so glad for them; they needed a little comfort, poor things, now if ever."

Mr. and Mrs. L., aged 72 and 74, alone in the world, and he has been hurt many times, and laid up for weeks. The last time he broke his leg, and he has been six months unable to do anything. She struggled on alone. Now he is home, but cannot as yet put on his shoes, and she has to provide for him, as well as herself.

Old and poor, she is willing to work, but it is comparatively little that her strength will allow her to do. One's heart grows very tender at sight of such devotion.

The Bowery Mission will be a scene of ceaseless activity from the early breakfast served on Thanksgiving morning till late in the evening, when the last cup of steaming coffee is handed out. In the interim the hundred-basket dinners will have been given out, and six hundred boys and more fed. It is a glorious work, and everyone connected with the blessed charity is happy in the doing.

"The Lord loveth a cheerful giver" and "he gives thrice who gives quickly" are good sayings to carry in one's mind as Thanksgiving Day approaches. We are sure that our appeals will not be in vain for the hearty co-operation of our CHRISTIAN HERALD family to unite with us in providing these dinners, which are so sorely needed on this Thanksgiving Day among God's poor. Our own blessings will be the greater as we remember and help those who cannot help themselves.

Let us make this Thanksgiving one to be remembered as most blessed for the giver, and never-to-be-forgotten by the poor of the crowded East Side who partake of the Bowery Mission hospitality.

GRANDMA'S HEART WILL GLOW AS SHE SITS BY THE BROKEN STOVE and in the quantity and-quality of all the good things contained in the basket.

In searching out the poor and needy to whom this invitation is extended, the workers at the Mission run across many pathetic cases; families so poor that to lift the veil of their poverty would seem almost an insult, for many of the poor families who will be given this dinner are very sensitive, and while grateful for help, and thanking God for friends raised up for them in

The Higher Patriotism

By Rev. W. R. Richards, D. D.

A Thanksgiving Sermon

THE Lord shall smite Egypt and heal it. The whole nation is spoken of as one person. You will remember how constantly in the Old Testament, families and tribes and nations are thus personified, a whole people in all its changes of fortune through the ages treated as one. As the ancient poets and prophets paint the vast picture of human history, its separate parts are so arranged as to leave most clearly impressed upon the eye not any one of the myriads of short-lived individuals, but these more enduring figures, of more heroic size, Edom, Moab, Tyre, Assyria, Babylon, Egypt. Those are the vast personages whose fateful story the picture shadows forth to us, and always chief among them, Israel.

Yes, the entire nation is made to appear before us as a person; it has a character of its own; a will of its own; there are national virtues; there is national guilt; there must be a national destiny of blessings or of curse.

No doubt this way of interpreting history may be carried to an extreme; everything made of the national personality, nothing of the individual. It had been so among the people of our Lord's day, and earlier, who counted themselves heirs of God's blessing from the mere fact of birth as children of Jacob; and who counted other men the objects of God's wrath from the mere fact of birth in some nation on which he had pronounced his curse. Our Lord and his apostles set themselves to correct this extreme; they lay great emphasis on the facts of individual character and destiny, that is, individual personality. Not whether the man is Jew or Greek or Roman or Egyptian; but what is he himself, this John or Philip or Rufus, in the sight of God.

We find this emphasis laid on individual personality again at the time of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century, and still more in the English Puritan Reformation in the seventeenth century; and most of all in the political and religious thinking of our Puritan New England on this side of the water. Individual opportunity, individual accountability, individual salvation or perdition, that is the theme.

Identity with National Life

But now again in our day we begin to suspect that this way of thinking has, in its turn, become extreme. The Old Testament conceptions of national character and national destiny have their truth also, which we overlook at our peril. We are reminded especially at this thanksgiving season, that a man in his individual life stands related to the larger national life much as a leaf stands related to the tree that bears it. The leaf has its own marked individuality, separating it in position and fortune from the innumerable other leaves rustling on the branches beside it. And yet its existence as a living thing cannot be separated from that larger organism of whose life it forms a short-lived and insignificant part.

Throw a thousand leaves from as many kinds of trees into a heap, and any one skilled in such study will have no difficulty in separating them, and telling to what tree each of them belonged. Gather thousands of people from all nations at an International Exposition, and any one skilled in the study of racial characteristics will have little difficulty in picking out this man as a Russian, and that as a Frenchman, and that as a Swede, and that as a German, and then a Mongol, and then a Negro; and beyond an Englishman, and distinguished even from him that Englishman of the second or third generation whom we call an American. There are national characteristics of form and color and motion appealing to the eye, characteristics of speech that appeal to the ear; and if you have opportunity for more intimate acquaintance you find these external characteristics the sign of inner distinctions of thought and feeling and faith equally universal and equally stubborn. Through all possible changes of condition the Jew will in some respects think as a Jew; the Roman as a Roman, the Gaul as a Gaul.

A man may try to indulge himself with the notion that he is absolutely independent, complete in himself, self-made, self-centred, a citizen of the world, not of a nation; but a thousand of these subtle differences rise up to contradict and undeceive him. The trunk from which he sprang, and on which he grew to maturity, has left its stamp upon him, and to the end of his life he will be known as belonging to it.

A Study in Patriotism

At this time of national Thanksgiving, we will lay aside our customary individualism for a little while, our smaller private hopes and fears and aspirations, and think of ourselves as a part of this larger personality, to which God has offered so large a place in the history of the world, and whose righteousness or sin, whose enduring blessedness or ruin, must be of such vast concern to the world.

It is a study in patriotism, and patriotism is not a mere fictitious sentiment; the feeling that the nation is something larger and more precious than the citizen, should become for us a settled conviction. That love of country which we do see often developed in time of war, by which a man really values his country's welfare and safety more highly than his own, is a just and reasonable affection. I suppose that is the habitual mood of any true soldier in time of battle, bred in him by all the traditions and discipline of the camp, that the country is more to him than he is to himself; and so, as a matter of course, he would feel happier to die in the hour of glorious victory, than to live unharmed in the hour of shameful defeat.

The Patriot's Self-Effacement

Now that soldierly self-effacement is the mark at which we must aim, in war or peace, the true mark of patriotism; that a man should habitually, in his own common mood and settled conviction, esteem the whole nation as worth more than himself, or any other private citizen, so that he would naturally be happier in any great national success which involved his private loss, than in a national disaster that involved his private gain. For a true patriot, the currents of national life will be allowed such free course through his veins, that even the small fragment of that national life which he enjoys as a single citizen, is more wrapped up with his own happiness than the whole of that individual life which belongs solely to himself.

You will see this sort of disinterestedness often exemplified in smaller affairs. Why, any college athlete would rather belong to the winning team, though no note was taken of his place in it, than to be praised in all the papers for his individual performance while the team was defeated. But the nation is so much larger than a team or a college, and the totality of its life seems less easily discernible by us, and, except in time of war, there is nothing to mark off its boundaries for us clearly, and so convince us of its living personality.

So it will need more earnest study, and faith, and constant effort to lift ourselves to any level of genuine patriotism. May this national festival encourage us in that effort, so that men in personal adversity may join in thanking God for national prosperity. Would that we could imitate those two greatest of all the children of Israel, who stand out as imperishable examples of an almost impossible devotion to country, Moses, who could pray, "If thou wilt not forgive this people's sin, blot me out of thy book;" and Paul, who could "wish himself accursed from Christ for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh."

Our subject has to do with character and destiny. If this Word of God teaches anything plainly it is that really and finally those two words are only different ways of saying the same thing, that character is destiny; but meanwhile, and to our limited view, they often seem to be two quite different things.

National Destiny

Let us think of the destiny first. There is such a thing as a national destiny, of happiness or misfortune, which is something more than the sum total of the present pleasures and pains of the several citizens. To say that a tree is dying is something more than to say that its several leaves are dying. Why, the leaves may not seem to be dying just yet; it may be springtime and the several leaves may seem to be thriving, and yet the force of the tree is spent and it is dying; or, on the other hand, the season may be fall, and the several leaves are withering, and yet the tree has the vitality of a hundred years to come yet stored up within it. A nation might be full of millionaires, or of men accumulating their millions, and yet be trembling on the edge of bankruptcy. A nation might be full of poor men, suffering the extreme of destitution, and yet have within itself the vigor and promise, after these wintry gusts of adversity have blown by, of abundant and permanent wealth.

And our point is, that if a man's view takes in anything beyond the passing day and year, if he cares for the children who will bear his name after him, or even for the peace and honor of his own old age, then this national destiny is of direct concern to him as well as his private destiny. For your own personal comfort merely, you might well prefer to be a withered leaf on a thriving tree, than to be a thriving leaf on a dying tree; you might well prefer to be a Dutch sea-beggar in the days of William the Silent, or a barefoot American patriot at Valley Forge, rather than Apicius with his millions in the decay of the Roman empire, or a wealthy noble of France in the days before the Revolution.

If it should be true that certain business methods in America, or any proposed tariff or currency law, were likely to build up individual fortunes at the expense of the public credit and of the permanent security of trade, then even the holders of those individual fortunes may be losing more than they are gaining, had they wit enough to see it; for it may not be possible to make their private gain large enough to compensate them permanently for their share in the public loss.

Preached in the Brick Church, New York. Text, Isa. 19:22. "And the Lord shall smite Egypt: he shall smite and heal it: and they shall return even to the Lord, and he shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them."

You remember old Mordecai's words to Queen Esther when she hesitated for a moment to risk her life by appearing before the king in behalf of her people, when Haman was plotting their destruction. "Think not of thyself," the old man said to her, "that thou shalt scape in the king's house more than all the Jews." And it seems to me that one saying might entitle this range book which never names the name of God to a place in the canon of Scripture. This Jewish Queen of Persia must not think that her personal exaltation separates her destiny from the destiny of her people. It would be better for her to lay down her life in an effort for their salvation than to survive their destruction.

It might be well for us if those words could be carved in the stone over the doors of our Senate chambers and Houses of Representatives, that any legislator might be, not ashamed only, but afraid to speak or vote for any bill that promised to enrich him or his constituents at the cost of national wealth or honor; if those same words might be carved also over our Exchanges and other places of business, that every banker and tradesman might be continually reminded of his own personal interest in discouraging all such methods of business as will endanger the public health and health. "Think not that thou shalt scape in thy palace more than all the people."

Ah, if we had some prophet to pull aside the curtain, and show us what a destiny God is offering to this nation of ours, a share in it offered to each one of us as citizens of this nation, I think many would turn in haste from their various petty selfish schemes of personal aggrandizement, to work for that larger good which is offered them as their share of the larger whole. This Thanksgiving festival should do that for us, all turning our thoughts from personal interests to the higher thought of national welfare.

You can fancy a crowd of people ignorant of the methods of modern navigation, who find themselves on a swift steamship in mid-ocean, drifting, or the fires are out in its furnaces, its machinery idle; and you see the people conspiring jealously, little groups of them, to make off with the best of the life-boats, or to chop the woodwork of the vessel to pieces for rafts to escape with to the distant shore. But after one or two such groups have succeeded in this selfish separation of themselves from the ship's company some passenger has a spirit of livation given him by which he discovers the purpose of those vast beams and cylinders in the murky abyss of the hold; and now he calls his fellow voyagers about him and explains to them their common interest in the safety and progress of the whole ship, and succeeds in impressing upon them their several responsibilities, each of them for doing something to further that progress; and soon some are hard at work in the coal bins, and others oiling the bearings, and others at the wheel, and others busying themselves with chart and quadrant; and an hour or two later the set of conspirators in the life-boat are left gnashing their teeth in the darkness and peril as the great ship sweeps past them toward her destined port.

If this American people would consent to receive from God the spirit of wisdom, I believe each of us would see and know that our personal interest in the national destiny is greater than any interest that we can have in our selfish private destiny, and we should shrink back with shame and alarm from any act of unpatriotic selfishness.

But I am impatient to look for a moment at the other side of our subject, the character side. A national destiny involves a national character. A righteous nation is something more than a haphazard assemblage of righteous people; an unrighteous nation is something more than a haphazard assemblage of unrighteous people. In each case the processes of the total national life have had something to do with the development of that moral health or disease. I am putting this thing strongly on purpose. We do not forget that there is another side to our subject. We do not forget that there may be holy individuals in an unholy state; one righteous man vexing his soul in unrighteous Sodom; but then even Lot's righteous soul seems to have suffered not a little in that wicked city from the prevailing contagion; and he was only an alien, not born and reared there. If the American character should ever become as corrupt as that of Sodom you may expect that the holiest American living among us will show the taint in his own character, and be saved from the common ruin so as by fire.

"IT MIGHT BE WELL IF THOSE WORDS COULD BE CARVED OVER THE DOORS OF OUR SENATE AND HOUSE."

Character, the national character: we were speaking just now of the national destiny; and how it stirs our hearts to think of that destiny, when we look over this broad and fruitful land of ours; its kindly ocean barriers, to save us from fears of foreign war; its long line of hospitable sea-coast dented by harbors, and its immense inland seas, large enough to float the whole world's commerce; its forests and mountains and lakes and streams; its illimitable plains, that might feed the populations of the earth; these infinite material resources, and the rich material destiny which they hold alluringly before our eyes—the mere recital of them in the annual proclamation of our rulers has often disposed us towards thankfulness and good cheer.

Oh, but that other opportunity set before our people—will you not uncover your heads with deeper reverence and gratitude as you think that this grander invisible moral opportunity, in this land of equal rights, of sacred memories, of inspiring hopes; where the fruits of all the costly experiments of the world have been poured into our lap, without the embarrassing debts left to other nations in the trying of those experiments. It is not of our doing, not at all an occasion for boasting, rather for humble and wondering gratitude to the great Ruler of all—but what a man he will be if the world is permitted to see him—this typical, ideal American! The world has not seen him yet. When we look at our own faces in the mirror of truth, we confess with shame that we do not see him there. One or two of his forerunners have appeared at critical times in our history, men of the heroic mould, to show God's architectural plan, but I fear the actual every-day American may seem hardly more like that ideal American than the actual every-day Jew of the olden time was like that ideal Son of David, whose picture constitutes the prophecy of Christ.

So the work and the conflict are still mostly ahead of us. The President of Yale University has lately declared it "a great mistake to assume that the problem of to-day is easier than that which confronted our forefathers." They had to secure liberty, we have to preserve it. They had to subdue a wilderness of rocks and trees; but it still remains to subdue another wilderness, to chop our way through the tangled and perilous jungle of the great city; to bring righteous order into all the confusion of national politics and trade, to let the wholesome sunlight of God's justice shine through all the rankest growths of human corruption and wrong. It is as hard a task as our fathers ever knew, harder; but if we have inherited any of their spirit, we shall face it with faith and courage.

That is what we celebrate our great Puritan festival for—to get more of the spirit of the fathers into their children. Pray God that the world may yet see in this Western Continent, not only good men and women, but good Americans; that this new type of virtue may be fairly wrought out here through the progress of the national life to national righteousness.

A NATIVE WEDDING IN INDIA

ALL the arrangements for a native wedding in India are usually made by the barber. He is the chosen matchmaker, and he even arranges that the father of the bride shall pay a certain sum to the boy's father as a dowry.

At the time of the wedding, the boy goes to the girl's house and they make a god of mud and worship it. Then they give presents of money to their caste fellows and presents to friends who are invited to the wedding. When we attended one of these native weddings, the friends showed us the bride and bridegroom, and then they gave us a present of a coconut and sweetmeats.

Those who can afford it, have a band playing continuously in connection with the wedding ceremonies. Weddings are very expensive, and families often incur debt from which they never recover.

During the ceremony the bride promises to "worship" the bridegroom all her life. She goes home to her parents' house, until she is about ten or twelve years of age. Girls are often married as early as two years of age. The wife cooks the food for the husband, and after he has been satisfied, she eats what he leaves. Among the high-caste, the wife always has a large covering over her face, so that no one, except her husband and his elder brother can see her.

In many cases, mere children are spoken for as wives, and often become widows without having lived with their husbands. Then their heads are shaven, all jewelry is taken from them and they are treated with disrespect, because the relatives think that the wife has been the cause of her husband's death.

In one province of India alone there are under two years, 1,574 widows; under three years, 1,651; under four years, 1,576; under five years, 3,861. These widows are never allowed to marry again, and they do the drudgery of the dead husband's family.

But our native orphan Christian wedding is quite different. Two of our girls were married in May, and both of them work side by side. They built a little home, about ten by twelve feet, and seven feet high, made of bamboo and mud. They eat together and have their prayers together, and the husband respects and loves his wife very much.

The Gospel IN THE "Canal Zone"

"THE CHURCH" AT FREEDLES

VALIENTE INDIANS LOADING BANANAS AT PANAMA

THE BRIDGE OF MANY BATTLES

CHRIST'S command to evangelize the world, is as binding on the Christian conscience to-day as when the words first fell warm from his blessed lips. Therefore retrenchment in Gospel effort should be to the Church an unknown quantity and "Advancement" should always be the watchword.

Among other agencies, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has its work here in Central and South America, and is spreading the good news. Many read it every week in places where other religious literature is almost unknown. The conditions of other Continents certainly claim our efforts, but not to the neglect of our own. Central and South America have pressing claims upon Christians, especially upon those of the United States. South America, with its thirty-four millions of people, has only 350 missionaries to tell them the "old, old, story." It is a distressing fact that so few know anything intelligently of the Son of God. The Papal Church has had charge of these people for centuries; but the masses are still held by its soul-enslaving forms. They are a people robbed and spoiled. Will God excuse us for our neglect of their souls?

Previous to 1888, very little had been attempted in Central America. In connection with the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, it was my privilege to be the pioneer missionary to Costa Rica and other republics. Since that time, representatives of other societies have come in, and shared the work. Something like a beginning has been made to meet the terrible need. While much has been done for the English-speaking people all along the coast, very little has been done for the Spanish-speaking population.

A Thanksgiving Melody

THE Lord of the feast spreads a board for His own,

And smiles on the least, as He smiles on the greatest,
The rapture flows down from the heavenly throne,
And the gladdest Thanksgiving is ever the latest.

For sheaves that are bound, and for fields that are shorn,

For plenty that burdens the bin and the byre,

For the glory and beauty of sunset and morn,

For the bright heads that meet round the bright, glowing fire.

For ships cleaving swiftly the ocean's profound,

For the lightning that carries our joy or our sorrow,

For the good will that girdles the wide earth around,

For the love of to-day, and the hope of to-morrow.

We lift up our hearts in an anthem of praise,

We are filled with desire, with bliss, as we're living,

And so, as a nation, we pause 'mid the days,

And offer Jehovah a nation's Thanksgiving. M. E. S.

An Indispensable Work

Charles Noel Douglas

MR. CHARLES NOEL DOUGLAS, the compiler of 40,000 Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, writes as follows concerning the scope of this most excellent production:

"In this work, the Independence Day speaker, burning with patriotic ardor, can find numberless gems wherewith to enrich his oratorical flights. Here the enraptured swain and the love-lorn maid may drink at a literary fount of love, that even Cupid himself might envy. In fact, there is scarcely a subject engaging the human mind, or an occasion, religious or secular, that has not been considered, and garnished with a generous setting of appropriate quotations, and embodied in this work. In short, to the orator, the student, the man in the street, and to all lovers of literature, ancient and modern, poetic or prose, this work will be found to fill a long-felt want, and in its scope and general usefulness, to be of inestimable value, and absolutely indispensable."

The Anti-Profanity League

THE Anti-Profanity League, a movement which was introduced through

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD three years ago, now reports a membership of 15,000, about 100 auxiliary societies, nine State secretaries, and members in forty States of the Union. It has secured the preaching of 250 sermons against swearing; has published cards, tracts and sermons; has circulated some 250,000 pieces of literature in its propaganda, and its correspondence department has handled a total of nearly 10,000 inquiries from those interested in the work. There are several special features of the crusade that are of interest, such as the securing of the organization and cooperation of a kindred movement in England, which has the indorsement of the King; the securing of membership in foreign lands, as Scotland, Ireland, Switzerland, South Africa and Canada; the holding of a public mass meeting in the historic Park Street Church of Boston; the securing of messages of indorsement and goodwill from President Roosevelt and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the institution of a league among the sailors in the Navy.

The National Reform Association has made the suppression of profanity one of the planks of its platform. The Rev. Drs. Withrow, Plumb, Pierce, Bates and Cameron, of Boston, with several well-known laymen, are the officers of the movement. The organization is equipped with literature, badges and regulations, and furnishes a practical and easy method of combating the prevalent habit of profanity.

Any one who will write to the Secretary, Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, Ward Hill Haverhill, Mass., will receive full particulars of the League.

THE RIDGEWAY'S THANKSGIVING

By MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

IT was the day before Thanksgiving, and the clouds hung low over the Western plains. Within the roomy loghouse where the Ridgeways lived there was almost summery warmth, however, and the promise of plentiful good cheer. Fragrant odors swept through every apartment, telling the story of pleasant preparation for the festal day, and in the midst of it were Mrs. Ridgeway and her twelve-year-old daughter Katie, busy as bees, humming almost as loudly, and fully as happy.

"We're going to have the usual Thanksgiving cold snap, I guess, mother," said Mr. Ridgeway, bringing in some fresh logs for the big sitting-room fireplace, and piling them on with a lavish hand. "The wind's in the northeast, and is blowing great guns. Dick and Dorothy'll be froze pretty near stiff by the time they've covered twenty miles. It isn't any fun to ride from Crag's Head a day like this. We must keep the fires going lively. I only hope it isn't going to snow," he continued, gazing anxiously at the threatening sky from the kitchen window.

"Oh, I guess it won't," replied his wife cheerfully. "If it does, it won't be anything but a flurry. It most always spits a little snow along about Thanksgiving, but it never amounts to much. That's right, pa; keep up rousing good fires, and I'll have a good dinner for them. Nothing in the world warms a body up like a good hot dinner. You'd better put the spare-ribs in now, maybe, Katie. Dorothy likes them roasted good and brown, and it is none too soon, I guess. And then get to work and peel the potatoes and turnips. I'll finish up these pies and make the doughnuts, and then I'm about done. I don't want anything left over for to-morrow, for I like Thanksgiving to be as much a rest-day as possible; and, besides, I do want to visit every minute with Dorothy. Seems like one whole day and a piece of another is such a stingy little visit for them to make us, and the very first one since they went to Crag's Head. I wish they didn't live so far away, or that Dick could have arranged to stop longer."

"Especially as we've never seen the baby, and he is four whole months old!" exclaimed Katie, in an injured tone.

"You should be thankful to have them to-day and to-morrow," said Mr. Ridgeway, still looking anxiously at the clouded sky. "When a man's business depends upon him he can't leave home to stop long. From what Dick writes, I guess he had lots of trouble getting somebody to take care of the store and post-office while he makes this much of a visit. I do wish it didn't look so much like snow. If it moderates the least bit that's just what is is going to do and no mistake."

"Well, what if it does?" said Mrs. Ridgeway, following her husband to the window and looking out over his shoulder. "Dick and Dorothy are neither sugar nor salt, and a spurt of snow never hurt anybody. Young blood don't mind the cold. Forever! Haven't you and I ridden miles and miles when the mercury was away below zero, and never thought of freezing? It was just the biggest kind of fun. I don't know what is getting the matter with you, pa. You're getting so you just worry about nothing at all. I hope you're not going to grow into a regular old croaker like old Zeke Poppus. I never did have any use for that kind of a person."

"Seems to me they'd ought to be here pretty soon anyhow," said Katie. "It's more than half-past twelve."

"Yes, to be sure they had, and doubtless will be in a very few minutes," joined in the mother quickly. "I presume they've got a good team, for Dick won't drive any other, and he makes them get over the ground at a good round pace, too. They ought to make the twenty miles in three hours. If they started right early they should be here now; but it isn't at all likely they got off before nine or half-past. There's always so many little things to 'tend to when a body leaves home for a day or two. I wouldn't put the vegetables on yet awhile, though, Katie. We don't want them overdone or waiting long." And the good woman bustled about energetically, while her husband still kept his post by the window, often stepping to the door to see if the wind had changed.

"It's got around more in the east," he observed after one of these explorations, "and it's beginning to snow, just as I knew it would. It's going to be a bad job, I fear, for the children, though if they got started in good time it don't matter much. The trouble is, if there is anything of a fall of snow, it'll make the wheeling heavy. I hope Dick won't take the river road. It's a good bit shorter, but dangerous, and he isn't very well acquainted with it. I don't think he was ever over it cook more slowly, and their delightful, appetizing odor was creeping all through the house. Katie had put a couple of extra boards in the dining-room table, and was spreading it with a host of good things, looking down the road every minute, hoping that she would be able to be the first to announce, "Here they come, mother!" but every time the words were fated to die upon her lips. They did not come.

Two o'clock, and the fire in the kitchen stove was allowed to wane, and the potatoes and turnips drained and set on top. Everything was now ready, but nothing was to be seen of Dick and Dorothy. And it was snowing! Not a little spurt, not just "spitting snow," as Mrs. Ridgeway had hoped, but coming down in a blinding, steady, smothery downfall that covered everything with a white mantle in a few minutes. It was hard to see any distance away now, and Mr. Ridgeway turned from the window and began putting on his fur cap, overcoat and mittens.

"It's going to be a bad storm," he said, "and I guess I'd better be getting the stock into safe quarters. I may as well have the poor beasts as comfortable as possible, in case it keeps on snowing, and I'm greatly afraid it will."

"Oh, I guess not," said Mrs. Ridgeway, determined to resist the fear that already assailed her heart. "It looks a little lighter off toward the west, I think, pa. Maybe it'll clear up pretty soon. We'll hope so, anyway. I'd give a good deal, though, if Dorothy and Dick were safe at home with us. Night falls so early now, and the baby is so young and tender. But there's no use in giving way to foolish fears. I'll make a pot of strong ginger-tea for them to drink, as soon as they come, so as to prevent their taking cold."

Three o'clock, and still no sign. The snow was already quite deep, and drifting terribly, full of little icy particles that cut the face, father Ridgeway said. They sat down to the table and tried to eat their dinner, but the tears of disappointment fairly choked the mother, and she was obliged to leave the room. Mr. Ridgeway's eyes were full, too, but he managed to drink his coffee and nibble at a biscuit, leaving Katie to make up all deficiencies. As she was a hearty, growing girl, and extremely hungry, she made a fairly good meal. In the midst of it she tried to suggest a bit of comfort.

"Maybe they never started at all, pa," she said. "Something may have happened. The baby may not have been well, or something." It was all "the baby" with Kate.

"Well, I am sure I hope they did not," sighed the father. "I don't see how they are going to get through if they did." And he rose and walked uneasily about the room.

The storm was now so dense and heavy that it was difficult to discern the front fence, and a little after four o'clock the shadows of night began to fall. "I do wish they would come," said Mr. Ridgeway, for the twentieth time. "If exposed long to a storm like this, it would not be impossible to freeze."

"Now, pa," expostulated the thoroughly agitated mother, "don't go to scaring me to death. Don't you suppose Dick has sense enough to take care of his wife and baby?"

"It isn't exactly a question of sense," replied Mr. Ridgeway, "but one of endurance. But I am really not so much afraid of the cold as of their going astray. The road is covered and the drifts are bad. And it is very difficult for horses to pull a buggy through any depth of snow."

"There never was a better 'Job's Comforter' than you, Pa Ridgeway," said his wife, almost irritably. "If you are so confident of danger, why don't you get to work and do something?"

but once, and then I drove the team. It isn't likely he paid much attention to it. I can't help feeling a bit worried, mother."

"Well, worrying won't do any good," said Mrs. Ridgeway philosophically, stepping around as lively as her weight would permit, and smiling in anticipation of this home-coming of her married daughter and the dear little baby, whom she had never yet seen. She had thought of little else for a month, and she and Katie had worked themselves almost ill over a number of pretty things for this same baby, the first and only one in the family; and now that the time had come, she would not admit the thought that anything was going to happen. It must not, it should not, she could not bear it. In spite of her husband's fearsome worries, they would certainly be along in a few minutes; by one o'clock, surely.

But one o'clock struck, and the hands crept relentlessly on to half-past, and yet there was no sign of the coming guests. The vegetables were bubbling in the kettles, the oven door was ajar that the spare-ribs might

Thanksgiving

ONCE more the circle of the seasons brings to us the joyous feast of Thanksgiving. As we glance backward over the months, the retrospect reveals abundant cause for gratitude. The mercies have far outweighed all the misfortunes; the year has been full of blessings. In the nation, peace and prosperity; in the fields, a multiplied harvest of cotton, corn, wheat, and all manner of fruits; in most homes, health, happiness and generous friendship. So many have been the tokens of our Heavenly Father's goodness, that the heart overflows with the sense of gratitude, which seeks to find expression at the lips.

At this season, let us not forget those whom prosperity has passed by—the poor and the needy. Let them have a share with ourselves in the general rejoicing. In order that on this day of all days they may not be unmindful of God's goodness, let us see to it that no poor family within our reach, no home where sickness or accident has prostrated the breadwinner, no widow left with her little brood to struggle single-handed with the world, is destitute of a good, substantial Thanksgiving dinner. What you give, let it be given with a liberal hand and a glad heart—

Even the humblest board may spare
To poorer poor a kindly share.

As you sit down to your own Thanksgiving dinner, the thought of the sunshine and smiles you have brought into some poor home and the gratitude you have awakened in sad hearts, will prove an excellent sauce to sharpen your appetite.

As in former years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this Thanksgiving, has arranged, with the aid of its generous-hearted readers, to spread a simple but satisfying feast for the poor of the East Side in New York. First, we are sending a hundred basket-dinners to very poor families, who have been searched out in their dingy tenement homes by the Mission workers, by pastors and by the visits of Christian men and women. Besides these, on Thanksgiving Eve, a turkey dinner will be provided for 600 destitute boys; at daylight on Thanksgiving Day, 1,000 homeless men will get a warm breakfast, and at 7 P. M., 600 of the unemployed and unfortunate will be seated at dinner in the Mission hall. Those of our readers who are co-operating in this special charity, will find their own enjoyment increased and their family reunions rendered more delightful for what they have done toward cheering and comforting the poor and unfortunate at this feast-time of the year.

The Gospels Under Fire.

ONE of our correspondents is deeply concerned about a sermon by a Louisville minister, which he has recently read, dealing with the Gospels from the destructive standpoint, and asks us to say whether the statements made therein are the real opinions of Christian scholars. We rarely deal with matters of this kind, as they are of doubtful practical utility, and have been for many years fully discussed by the critics without benefit to the minds of ordinary Christians; but lest others may be troubled by these doubts, it may be well to examine the assertions made in the sermon.

These are: That Paul has nothing to say about the historic Jesus; that several generations passed before the three synoptic Gospels were compiled and given to the world; that the Gospel according to John was written about 150 A. D., by an unknown writer; and that scholars are agreed that this Gospel has little or no historic value. There are other assertions of a similar character in the sermon, but these are the most definite and most important. It is evident, although the sermon was preached quite recently, that the preacher has not kept up with the discussions of the day, but has accepted theories which modern scholarship has rejected. It is now about thirty years since these theories were advanced, and the tendency of later thought, even among the German scholars, is to reject them.

Taking up the assertions in the order adopted by the preacher, we examine first that about Paul. The character of the Epistles, and the purpose for which they were written, as pastoral letters to the Churches he had founded, would not lead us to expect to find in them references to the historic Jesus. As he had fully preached to them "Jesus and him crucified," there was no need to go over that ground again in his letters. Indeed, the absence of reference to it is a presumption in favor of the belief, that the people were already familiar with the facts, and that what those to whom he wrote needed was to have the significance of the facts pointed out to them. We read that everywhere he went he preached unto them Jesus and the Resurrection, and the Epistles are full of references to these sermons, in which, as he says, he had fully preached the Gospel of Christ. Besides this, in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, he enters fully into the facts as to the Resurrection of Jesus, which is precisely the fact that men of the Kentucky preacher's way of thinking are most unwilling to concede. That chapter alone fully disposes of the preacher's assertion that "Paul has nothing to say about the historic Jesus."

The second assertion in order is that "several generations passed before the first three Gospels were compiled." A generation is roughly calculated as thirty-three years, but as the generations overlap, it will be conceded that men who lived to old age, might have given verbal testimony covering a longer period. Polycarp lived to be eighty-six. He was the pupil of the Apostle John, and was born in 69, A. D., about forty years after the Crucifixion. He does not mention the Gospels, but he gives verbally accurate quotations from them, which is presumptive evidence of their being in existence in his day. Papias, who wrote about 130, A. D., when only four generations had passed, and when the immediate successors of the Apostles were still alive, had at least three of the Gospels in his possession, and refers to Matthew and Mark by name, and says that Mark wrote under the superintendence of Peter and that Matthew wrote in Hebrew. Justin Martyr, who was born in 100 A. D., speaks of "The records of the Apostles which are called Gospels." Thus we have testimony that the first three Gospels were in existence at the beginning of the second century, when only three generations had passed, and the quotations show that they are identical with the Gospels now in our hands.

The third assertion relates to the fourth Gospel, and the preacher makes the point that it differs from the other three, both in what it inserts and what it omits. If we regard it as a supplemental life, written by a man who had the other three Gospels before him, both the omissions of the facts they had stated, and the addition of facts that they had failed to record, are perfectly natural. John was the most intimate friend of the Master and could give facts which neither Mark nor Luke would know. The general opinion is that John wrote his Gospel about the year 70 or 80. There is strong evidence for that opinion in the writings of men who lived in the early part of the second century, who quote sayings of our Lord, which are given in the fourth Gospel and no other. That it was not a forgery, but was actually written by John, may be inferred from the fact that it was so recognized by Irenæus, who had an excellent opportunity of knowing the truth, as he was a disciple of Polycarp, who was a friend of John.

So much for the historical evidence which, we submit, fairly answers and disposes of the Louisville pastor's argument.

The Peace Palace

FROM the Hague the news comes that the Committee appointed to select a site for the World's Peace Palace, Andrew Carnegie's gift to the nations, has made its choice. Unless the plan should be changed hereafter, the Peace Palace will be erected in the near future on ground situated between the Benoordenhoutsche Way and the Waasenaarsche Way—a central and convenient location near Holland's capital. Queen Wilhelmina's government will present this beautiful site to the Court of Arbitration, so that none of the building fund need be expended outside of the structure itself. There are several acres of noble grounds.

In the coming generations, when the disputes of the different nations are brought before this great tribunal for adjustment, when the world has clothed itself with peace as with a garment, and war has become a relic of the barbaric past, the writers and orators of the future day will tell, in eloquent words, the story of so long and arduous, and often seemingly hopeless, struggle for peace. And they will tell of the rearing of the Peace Palace, and how all lands watched it, as it went up stone by stone and pillar by pillar; and it may be that the anniversary of its dedication will be celebrated by the peoples of the whole earth, then all civilized with a fervor and spontaneous enthusiasm that shall make all of our present patriotic holidays seem tame and insignificant. For then will the race have realized the prophetic vision of the inspired poet:

Meanwhile, and until that "beautiful dream" comes true, as come it will, wars and disputations will go on. But we who are doing the pioneer work in this wonderful campaign will not be discouraged. We will go on hoping and praying and working with the great end in view, and in the full confidence that it will all come right in God's own good time.

Among the Workers

—MISS HELEN GOULD has just completed a 6,000 mile trip in the West, during which she has visited some twenty railroad and city Y. M. C. A.'s, and shaken hands with over 20,000 railroad men.

—REV. R. ASHLEY CAKE, of Port Republic, N. J., the Life-savers' Evangelist, who has been ill for some time past, is now recovered, and will resume his labors among the life-saving stations of the New Jersey coast.

—MANO RAMABAI, daughter of Pandita Ramabai, of Poona, India, writes: "We have had some beautiful showers here lately. Everybody was expecting a famine, but in answer to the prayers of his people, God has sent the rain, which has gladdened the hearts of the farmers."

—A MISSIONARY in Kwangsi, South China, writes that during the recent famine in that province, many tons of rice were contributed by the charitable institution of Canton. A large fund was raised under the leadership of Sir Henry Blake. A number of British residents aided in the distribution of the rice sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—MISSIONARY JOHN G. PATON, writes from Australia: "The work of our New Hebrides mission advances slowly, among the 40,000 cannibals yet on the group, who cling to their caste and idolatry. The heathen are involved in a general war, and many persons are being shot, while about a thousand professed Christian converts keep aloof from it, and live in peace. The heathen have shot number of our Christians, but their relatives and friends do not fight in revenge, but, Quaker-like, weep over the lost, pray for, and do all the good possible for the murderers."

ONE of the combatants in the awful struggle now going on in the Far East, is growing weary of the fight. Doubtless the other Power is weary too, but its pride shrinks from confessing the fact. Japan has made a Russia's trouble with England is approaching settlement. It is now agreed that the explanation of Admiral Rojestvensky, who was in command of the Russian fleet which fired on the fishing vessels, cannot be substantiated. He claimed that there were Japanese torpedo boats among the trawlers, but it is clearly proved that none could have been there.

She had disappeared unaccountably, and it was feared she had been waylaid and murdered. One day a person living in a flat-house, of which only the upper floors were rented, thought she heard a strange noise as she was going to her rooms on the top-floor. It was so like a groan that she investigated, knowing that there was no one living on the ground floor. She went down to the basement and listened. Again she heard the noise, and found that it proceeded from a closet, the door of which was locked. Rapping on the door, she was answered by a voice within of some one begging to be released. She

The Election

The sweeping Republican victory has astonished even the Republicans themselves. Not since the famous campaign of 1872 has a candidate succeeded in getting so large a majority in the Electoral College as Mr. Roosevelt. If, as now seems probable, Maryland's vote will be divided, he will have 337 votes against 137 for Judge Parker. The only States that went Democratic were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia, with Maryland still in doubt. Even Missouri went Republican. In New York State, where the vote was expected to be close, the plurality for Roosevelt was 174,434. A singular exception was Massachusetts, where a Democratic Governor was elected. The victory extends to Congress. The next House will comprise 242 Republicans and 144 Democrats. In the present House the majority is only 34. In 1890 the Democrats had a majority of 127. Mr. Roosevelt promptly announced that under no circumstances would he accept another nomination as he regarded the three and a half years he will have served in March next as his first term. For the sake of the whole country we may hope that the admonition of Israel's aged king may be heeded by the statesmen to whom the direction of the policy of this great nation is confided for the next four years.

The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God (II. Samuel 23: 3).

Her Life for Her Money

A sad tragedy is reported from Matawan, N. J. On Nov. 10 a fire broke out in a large building at South Keyport. On one of the floors lived a man and his wife. They had early intimation of the fire and both made their escape, but as the building was old and the fire made rapid progress, the basement was full of smoke when they passed through it. The man ran to the fire-alarm box to send in notice of the fire, leaving his wife standing, half-dazed, on the pavement in front of the house. On his return he was astonished at not finding her still there. He then remembered that their savings, amounting to $350, were left behind in one of the bureau drawers. It occurred to him that his wife might have gone back to save the money. In any case he resolved to go in and see if she had returned. Breaking away from the police, he went in, but was driven back by the flames. Not, however, until he had seen his wife lying helpless on the stairs. It was impossible to reach her, as the staircase was already blazing fiercely. It was not until the following day that her charred body was recovered. The burned fragments of the money that she had gone back to save were tightly grasped in her hand. She had lost her life in a vain attempt to save the money. It was a foolish thing to do, but there are some who are doing a thing still more foolish, in running the risk of losing their souls in the struggle to get money.

What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36).

direct offer of peace to Russia, but its conciliatory attitude has been disregarded. An offer was also made by Gen. Nogi on the part of Japan to Gen. Stoessel, offering him honorable terms for the surrender of Port Arthur, after it became clear that the fortress must fall. The general pointed out that a continuance of the conflict would involve a useless loss of life, and suggested the advisability of surrender. General Stoessel replied contemptuously, and informed the messenger who brought the offer under cover of the white flag, that if any further offers of the kind were brought he would fire on the messenger. In spite of his threat, another proposition was sent by Japan. It was that non-combatants, women, children, priests and civil servants should leave Port Arthur, and a safe conduct through the Japanese lines was promised them and a free transport to Dalny. This offer, though it would have reduced the number of mouths and so have caused the provisions, of which there is a scarcity in Port Arthur, to last longer, was also rejected. There are also rumors of a dynastic effort to stop the continued sacrifice of life. It is reported that the Queen of England has been in communication with her sister, the dowager Empress of Russia, and through her with the Emperor, pleading with them for a consideration of proposals of peace, and assuring them that the English Government would gladly assist in securing honorable terms. The result of this effort is not yet known.

In the meantime, the slaughter at Port Arthur continues without abatement. The reckless desperation with which the Japanese assail the fortress is matched by the determined and resolute courage of the Russians in its defence. Mines have been dug around the approaches, by the explosion of which whole regiments of the Japanese have been blown up. Barbed wire entanglements have been constructed, and every device known to modern warfare has been employed by the brave defenders; but in spite of all, the grip of

THE JAPANESE MESSENGER BEARING THE OFFER OF PEACE TO GEN. STOESEL

The commission which is to apportion responsibility is to sit in Paris, and will be composed of representatives of Russia, England, France and the United States, with a fifth member to be chosen by the other four. What a pity it is that such a court of arbitration should not be empowered to settle the whole question of the war with Japan, and so the terrible sacrifice of life be stayed! To Russia it would involve a loss of prestige, but it would bring the honor that the wise king said should belong to the lover of peace.

It is an honor for a man to cease from strife (Prov. 23: 3).

Self-Imprisoned

An extraordinary solution of a problem which puzzled the police was found at procured help and the door was broken open. There the woman for whom the police were searching was found, faint and weak. She said she had been there four days and three nights, without food or light. She had been nervous, and believing she was being followed had entered the house and hid herself in the closet, the door of which closed with a spring-lock, which she could not open. She had called and rapped in vain, and had given up hope when she was found. It was fortunate for her that her groan was heard. If she had remained a prisoner much longer she would probably have lost her life. How many there are who lose their souls in a similar way. By some foolish act, they are caught in a snare from which they cannot deliver themselves.

MRS. M. G. MOISE

Rescue Work in the World's Fair City

By MRS. E. M. WHITEMORE — Founder of the Door of Hope

MRS. E. M. WHITEMORE

BY way of a prelude, let me give a brief personal testimony, feeling it but due to many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who so kindly held me before God in their prayers, for months last winter, during a protracted and serious illness. Upon May 20th, at 9.15 P. M., most suddenly, God graciously gave the healing touch. From the first, when stricken down, I found myself unable to pray for aught else than that his highest and best thought in connection with it all should be carried out. When every trace of that spinal difficulty disappeared, the very "joy of the Lord" became even more literally my strength; for, before the close of that same week, I was able to return home and to the work so dear to my heart. To God be all the glory!

Although numerous efforts were put forth by zealous and faithful workers in St. Louis, before and after the World's Fair was opened, for the rescue of young girls who had for evil purposes been unduly influenced there, little seemingly was accomplished outside of occasional cases being materially aided or returned to their homes. Who can tell though but in the great hereafter many a glad and welcome surprise will await those laborers who, though often weary and discouraged, traversed the streets upon their Christlike mission. The very fearlessness and publicity of this movement, however, excited the anger and malice of the vicious element, they resorting to cunning to further their diabolical traffic, and to conceal the method of transporting girls from various places. Hundreds were conveyed into the city in carriages from distant stations, as was discovered by our private detectives. These victims were sometimes passed off as daughters or sisters by the accompanying agent. Some of the agents adopted the robe of deep mourning as they passed with their victims in charge, and so escaped detection by those whose duty it was to meet any unprotected girl at the trains.

While all this was going on outside of the grounds, the Door of Hope Society felt justified in setting aside certain amounts to pay the entrance fees of their workers into the Fair itself. In a quiet manner, under the supervision of Mrs. M. G. Moise, president of the St. Louis Door of Hope, No. 61, they worked from day to day upon the grounds, distributing thousands of tracts, and when opportunity offered, entering into personal conversation. Some seriously objected to this method, while others listened patiently and appreciatively. Mrs. Moise was indefatigable and by her example greatly encouraged her assistants. There was an ample field for the workers on that large area of over twelve hundred acres.

While there, my heart ached with the conviction that it seemed like working against great odds; but if the Gospel seed had not been sown at all, greater would have been our condemnation. Day by day, the buildings were canvassed in turn, and for the same purpose the Pike was repeatedly visited. To many invitations were extended to attend the Door of Hope services in the Home.

The St. Louis Door of Hope was, at times, inadequate to comfortably accommodate all who were willing to come. Frequently as many as eleven girls were obliged to occupy the same room. Still, provision was made as far as possible for every one who appeared needy.

Though sincerely appreciating the courtesy of those in authority toward our work ever since we secured space on the grounds in Educational Hall, we were, nevertheless, totally unprepared and surprised over the contents of an official communication, which informed us that "the silver medal of the St. Louis World's Fair was to be awarded the Door of Hope Exhibit." Around this exhibit, from time to time, crowds would gather to examine the contents of our cabinet, which contained a collection of fine photographs of some of the various Doors of Hope opened during the past fourteen years. Besides these photographs, our different branches were also represented—namely, the Street work, the Monstrosity work, with pictures and fan articles made by these poor, misshapen beings; the Slum work, the Children's work; the Door of Hope Gospel Mission, under the faithful ministry principally of Miss C. Ellis, superintendent, the whole closing with a Tract Exhibit, giving accounts of some of our converted girls.

Over the cabinet hangs the pictures of "Delia," formerly known as "the Bluebird of Mulberry Bend" showing very strikingly the work of grace upon human face, the small likeness being taken three months after her rescue from a den of sin, and the larger, showing the changed being with the Christ her heart shining forth in her face, a few months previous to her death.

Are the girls on the street worth saving? Delia was only one out of many. Such as she will not, as a rule voluntarily come to us; we must search for them, at any sacrifice, no matter how great, is a paltry consideration if only here and there one can be snatched "as brand from the burning." How much it will mean later on we cannot begin to estimate; but we know will far exceed our present comprehension. Should not the very thought of being permitted to thus glorify God be incentive sufficient to spur us on into greater activities for the Kingdom, as the days go by?

TWO LITTLE DUSKY VISITORS

NOT long ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was pleased at receiving a call from Mrs. Almira S. Steele, and two little colored boys belonging to her Home for Needy Children at Chattanooga, Tenn. These bright-eyed little chaps showed beyond a doubt that Mrs. Steele is doing a remarkable work among the poor and needy black children of the South.

Lemuel and Irving are wonderfully intelligent little fellows, with very sweet voices. They were brought to Mrs. Steele by a foster-grandmother, who said they were children whom no one wanted.

In speaking of these little unfortunates, Mrs. Steele says: "I am sorry to say there are numbers of such 'outcasts,' whom nobody wants, thrown out upon this unfriendly world. How my heart aches for them! Surely they are worth raising, and I am so glad God has permitted me to try to be a Christian mother to more than one thousand of them since starting the Home in 1884. The two little boys whom I brought to call at the Bible House, I have had ever since they were learning to walk."

Every morning, in Mrs. Steele's Home, all the household, from the eldest to the youngest, assemble for prayer, and thus the little ones learn early in life what the good Father has done for them.

Lemuel and Irving told an interested group of listeners what God did in the first seven days of the world's history. They repeated the names of Jacob's twelve sons and the ten plagues. Then the little fellows recited the books of the Bible and the commandments, in unison. It was really wonderful how much these boys had learned in a few short years, and if, when they are old, they depart from the right path, it will not be because of insufficient training in their youth.

On her way home, Mrs. Steele stopped and took charge of five other children. She had promised their dying mother that she would bring up the family, and in fulfillment of her promise, Mrs. Steele now has five more helpless members of her numerous household. The youngest of the family just taken is a girl, two years old.

This good "Mother in Israel" writes: "I am so glad I can be a help and comfort to them."

A larger boy also came with Mrs. Steele, on her recent trip north, and when he sang with Lemuel and Irving, their voices blended very sweetly in sacred and patriotic songs, which they entered into with the spirit that seems so natural among the colored race.

"That Little Gal in Ing'y"

By ADELINE M. TESKEY

JANE BENDER was a meek little woman, who had very few of what are generally considered advantages in life. She learned to read and write at the country school, and very soon after leaving school she married Jake Bender, and settled down to the life of a farmer's wife.

The husband was a rough fellow, utterly devoid of any polish, and a superficial observer could not but wonder what there was about Jake to commend him to any woman, not to mention the meek, pretty little woman, who had become his wife.

Jane had but one avenue out into the great world beyond her own neighborhood. In her early school days, she had a seatmate and chum, Lavinia Millar; while yet in childhood, her life and that of Lavinia's drifted apart, the latter attended a higher grade school, and eventually went as a missionary to India.

Owing to the fact that this friend of her childhood was there, Jane's heart had thrown out many a strong tendril toward that strange benighted land, and the very first money she could really call her own, money she had earned by taking first prize at a provincial fair for a lamb that she had raised, she sent to Lavinia, to be expended in any way toward the betterment of her own sex, that the latter thought proper.

Lavinia Millar decided to use the money thus sent to her toward the education of a little native child, who was brought to the mission about the same time that Jane's money arrived. And she wrote back to this effect to her old schoolmate, telling her that she had christened the sweet little girl on whom the money was to be expended, Jane Bender.

It made a great stir among her neighbors on the surrounding farms, and in the village, where she carried some of her farm products, when it became known that Jane Bender, as some of them said, had "adopted a little gal in Ing'y," and conjectures deep and wide were indulged in as to her reasons for doing so.

"Plenty o' heathen to home," said Peter McKim (Peter was noted for keeping a tight grip on his purse); "why must Jake Bender's wife be sendin' her dollars off after a young un in furrin parts?"

Jane Bender is a-thinkin' she'll hev someone to fall back on in her old age, her own children bein' dead," said Peter's wife in a knowing whisper. "Like enough she'll bring the little Ing'y girl out here when the child's large 'nough to travel alone."

"Tut!" said the worldly-wise Peter, "twould cost more to pay her passage than to hire a girl here."

"But a hired girl ain't like one o' your own, even ef it is on'y an adopted one," returned his unconvinced wife.

"Jane's crazy!" exclaimed Mrs. Perkins, who lived on the adjoining farm, "spendin' her hard-earned money on a strange child; like enough she'll turn out bad when she is reared and bring Jane's grey hairs in sorrow to the grave!"

"Make to yourselves friends of the mammom of unrighteousness that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations," said the Village Saint, without raising his eyes from the shoe he was binding, "Mrs. Bender is but obeying her Lord's injunction."

But among all the cloud of witnesses which compassed Jane about, none were more profoundly impressed at the way she chose to spend her prize-money than her great burly husband, Jake. His astonishment was beyond expression. She had not asked his advice about its disposal, and he did not know whether he should approve or not, so he remained silent (except for odd conversations he had with himself) and mystified. But when the letter came stating that the little girl in India had been given the name Bender, he completely surrendered.

It was evening when the Benders received the letter containing the marvelous intelligence of their Indian possessions, and Jake and Jane retired, but not to sleep. The little girl in India, or her ghost, wandered over their house all night. She stood by their bedside, rocked the small chair in their room, stepped airily up and down stairs, brushed their faces with her soft hair, clasped her chubby arms around their necks, and, in fact, allowed them only spasmodic naps until dawn came peeping in the window and sent her away.

By this time the birds outdoors were than once, "Janey, Janey Bender 'way off there in Ing'y."

Somehow there seemed to have come suddenly to Jake, a strange spiritual awakening; he looked with a sort of mysterious awe at the pale yellow sky, and the purple mist hanging beneath it. The sky tint was casting a soft golden glow over the field, and there was something about the whole scene which made Jake think of a hymn his mother used to sing, Jerusalem! the golden! with milk and honey blest.

He lifted his hat, and drew the part of his arm covered by a shirt sleeve over his forehead to wipe off the drops of perspiration that stood there in big beads.

He drew a long trembling breath, that was almost like a sigh, shook the reins which were around his body, and with a loud, "G'lang Sorrel, g'lang Snow!" he started his horses again.

"LAVINY 'LL BE GOOD TO HER," SAID JANE.

giving each other their morning salute, and Jake rose to feed his horses preparatory to doing his fall ploughing; Jane rose to get breakfast.

The eastern heavens were a pale yellow, and an exquisitely soft purple tint was obscuring the horizon line, when Jake hitched his horses to the plough, and began his long trip.

His tall, lank form leaned over the plough, one suspender over his shoulder and the other encircling his waist; the sleeves of his blue gingham shirt were rolled up to his elbows, revealing a pair of sinewy, sunburnt arms, while his large, brawny, work-hardened hands guided the plough. The exterior was unmistakably common, not to say ugly, but there was something very rare and beautiful at that moment stirring in Jake's inner consciousness. If you were near enough to him, you would have heard him say softly to himself more

Up and down the long furrows trod Jake all that forenoon, but keeping step with him, controlling his thoughts, smoothing his temper, and softening his speech, was the little girl from "Ing'y."

By and by there came reverberating across the acres that intervened between Jake and his home, the long, slow blast of a tin horn.

"Dinner!" he ejaculated, glancing up at the sun; "shortest forenoon I've ever known."

Jake unhitched the horses from the plough and started for home. The sun was pleasantly warm on that autumn day even at noon, and the plough horses, impatiently switching their tails and shaking their heads, walked through various swarms of winged insects while preceding their master to the stable; a bird snatched agilely at one of these insects that came in dangerous proximity to his sharp little beak; a small garter snake glided from under Jake's feet off into the longer grass, and a field mouse ran athwart his path, but Jake heeded none of them. While he walked from the field to the stable he saw little Janey grow from childhood to womanhood, have as great an education as Lavinia Millar—and he could imagine nothing greater—come out to this country to make him and Jane a visit. He was just planning their return visit to India when the stable was reached.

When he had given each of the horses a measure of oats he went into the house. He washed his hands in the tin basin at the kitchen sink, drew his fingers through the hair immediately surrounding his brow, and sat down in silence to his dinner. Jane, too, was silent and preoccupied; she also had spent the forenoon with the little girl from India. A pair of small pattering feet had run about after her as she swept and dusted, strained and skimmed the milk, washed dishes, cooked, and took the thousand-and-one steps that fall to the lot of women of her class, and love had done for labor what it has been doing from the beginning of time.

As Jake was helping himself to a third piece of thick apple pie, as a finish to his noon repast, he said suddenly:

"I wonder what they'll give her to eat."

Jane seemed to know intuitively the line in which Jake's mind was running, for she replied promptly:

"Lavin'y'll be good to her."

"I hear tell they feed on rice mostly out there," added Jake, "an' that's thin livin' to my way o' thinkin'. Better write to Lavin'y an' tell her to give the little gal 'nough, even ef we hev to pay more for her keeps."

"Lavin'y'll be good to her," repeated Jane, "she was always generous when we traded apples at school."

Early that afternoon Jake stopped his ploughing to go into the village. He decided to walk, as the horses were tired. He had only gone a quarter of a mile when he met a neighbor.

"Hello" said the neighbor, coming to a standstill in front of Jake, "I hear tell you hev adopted a little gal in furrin parts."

Before he reached the village two more neighbors had asked him about the little girl in India.

"By gum!" said Jake, after the last questioner had left him, "it's mighty nice to own a little gal in Ing'y. Neighbors seem to think so too." He straightened his shoulders, stepped faster, and felt for the moment as if he owned the wealth of the Indias. "S'pose ef she was round here now she'd be a-callin' me Pa, same's our own Janey used to do aforeshe died."

Some tight feeling in his throat made Jake run his fingers around the neck-band of his shirt. With this act a new thought was suggested, and Jake gave it voice.

"I'll be slivered ef I don't think a man who owns a little gal out there in Ing'y ought to wear a collar. P'raps Janey'd want her pa to wear a collar. I'll buy a paper one when I get to the village store which will hold out 'till I git home. Jane hes three or four all ironed up an' put 'way to hev ready 'gainst funerals; she wouldn't mind ef I'd put one on every time I came to the village."

When Jake reached the village he turned a corner suddenly, and met the minister, Jane's minister, as he always mentally characterized him, for Jake himself did not belong to any church; nor ever even attended one.

THE ORIENTAL "HIGH PLACE"

Joyous Returning to God

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

ISAIAH'S hope in King Hezekiah. The young King Hezekiah had been on the throne only a few weeks and reform was the order of the day. At his command, his father's Assyrian altar had been removed from the Temple court and destroyed, and the great altar of God brought back to its rightful place. In the short space of sixteen days in the first month of his reign, he had caused the Temple to be cleansed of the idolatrous accumulations of the sixteen years which comprised the reign of his father, King Ahaz. He did not even spare the brazen serpent, which Moses had made at the command of God, for it had lost its significance, and had become only another idol. In hot indignation, he called it nehushlan (a piece of brass), and he ordered it destroyed. When the great house cleansing was finished at the end of the sixteen days, King Hezekiah had loud trumpets blown to call the people together to worship God, and the doors of the Temple were thrown open. He had also written letters with his own hand, inviting people from all over his kingdom to come. Determined to have the rulers of the city present, he rose early in the morning, and went to their homes to fetch them. The king and Isaiah were at one in all that he had been doing, and he had often sent for him to inquire of the Lord if his plans were right. As they approached the Temple area, they could but be reminded of how it must have looked in the days of King Solomon, so great was the throng of people. And the Levites were there by thousands, with cymbals and psalteries and harps furnishing a choir. As they came within the courts, they saw the vessels of the Temple, the laver, great altar, table of shew-bread, etc., which had been mutilated by King Ahaz, repaired as but they could be in the short space of time, and in their right places. Preparations were already going forward for burnt-offerings upon the altar, in behalf of the sins of the people, asking God's forgiveness. It was a great occasion, which lasted fourteen days; seven of these days were the Feast of the Passover. The people of their own accord remained yet the other seven days. King Hezekiah himself gave a thousand bullocks and ten thousand sheep, and the princes did likewise. It was but the beginning of reforms on the part of King Hezekiah, for in the valley below the Temple was the horrible image of Molech, emitting a fearful odor, from the burned flesh of children, who had been cast into its arms. This was now cooling, ready for the destroying hand of King Hezekiah. And the whole city and the whole land now waiting to be cleansed as he had cleansed the Temple. Old men said: "He will make as righteous a king as his grandfather Jotham, and his great-grandfather Uzziah."

Others said: "He is worthy to be mentioned with King David himself." He shows us what can be done by one man when he starts out in the strength of God to do what needs to be done. And so it was with King Hezekiah, his reign was prolonged fifteen years in answer to his prayer to God, in order that he might complete the work he had begun. He had kept up an uncompromising war against idolatry throughout his entire reign, for as soon as the Temple had been reopened he had gone out into the cities of Judah and broken down images, and cut down groves, and broken down high places, where the sun was worshiped, until they had all been utterly destroyed. He reigned in all twenty-nine years, and all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem did him honor at his death.

ILLUSTRATION AND APPLICATION

For the Church this lesson means reformation; for the individual, repentance. In each case it calls us to cast out Baal from a temple belonging to God.

1. Reformation—THE CHURCH RECOVERED FROM BAAL. Except for those too young, this is the very lesson from which to teach why Americans do, and all others should, repudiate the union of Church and State, which in every age has brought Baal's altar into the church, and pushed God's altar aside, and has made necessary all the great reformations, and yet exists to-day in every great nation save our own. France will soon join us. Even here, it creeps in, under various disguises. It would seem, at first glance, a good thing that Hezekiah "commanded the priests," inasmuch as he was a good king, and commanded the right thing. But the trouble is that if the king is given this power, the kings that are bad, as well as those that are good, must be at the head of the Church, and as kings are more often bad than good, more harm than good is sure to come, for example, the three kings that preceded Hezekiah—Uzziah, Jotham and Ahaz—were each of them unfitted to be the head of the Church, which might be said of many in our own time. That God did not approve of king lording it over the Church, we see when Uzziah was smitten with leprosy, because he acted as a priest and offered sacrifice. God called Moses to be head of the State, and Aaron to be head of the Church. So when Saul became Israel's first king, Samuel was the independent head of the Church. As Judah's history shows how badly it works to have the government manage the Church, the history of the Roman Catholic Church shows that it is even worse to have the Church lord it over governments. Even in England at this hour, leading Christians are in jail, because they will not pay taxes to support schools controlled by the Church of England, as the government requires, because it is the State Church. And for any government to make appropriations to sectarian institutions, as our national government has done, and may do again, if not restrained by public opinion, and as some of our States are doing to-day, is a disguised form of this ancient wrong. But while the United States Government does not support any one favored Church gan. No one has any right to work for church reformation, even by criticism, till he has purged his own heart temple by repentance. It took half a month to clean out the corrupted and neglected Temple. Our heart temples are as corrupt, but it need not take us so long for Christ is a quick cleaner. If we confess, he will cleanse (I. John 1: 8). For most of us this is the practical part of the lesson. Let us not make the common mistake, represented by the woman of Samaria (John 4) who tried to change the subject from her own sins by asking Christ, Which is the true Church? He pointed to the Baal altar in her own heart, and called her first to repent herself, and then to call her neighbors to repentance.

*International Sunday School Lesson for December 4. H. Chron. 29: 18-31. Golden Text: I. Sam. 2: 30: "Them that honor me I will honor."

The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne,
And worship only thee.

It is good for us who think repentance hard, when surrounded by Christian friends, with nothing to give up but what will harm us; nothing worth calling a "sacrifice," to see how real are the sacrifices offered to God by many converted heathen. A Chinaman in China applied for Church membership, but he had fifteen acres of poppies which he sold for making opium, as some in our country sell their hops and grain to the brewer, their grapes to the wine-maker. The Chinaman was told that mission churches could not admit anyone who was connected with the opium traffic, that kills body and soul. The next day he came covered with mud and dirt, but glorious as a battered warrior returning from victory. He had destroyed the whole crop, and held out his hands, saying eagerly, "Now it is all right. I shall be poor, and I have dirty hands, but I have a clean soul." He had made thorough work of cleaning his heart-temple.

"THEN THE PRIESTS AND LEVITES AROSE AND BLESSED THE PEOPLE" and appoint its preachers—the two things always go together—we have always recognized the union of Christianity and the State, and God's kingship as our Supreme Ruler, by oaths of office, by chaplaincies, by Thanksgiving Days, and by closing the offices of government on Sundays. On February 29, 1892, the Supreme Court said: "This is a Christian nation." It is an error to say that Sunday laws imply a union of Church and State, for while the "Lord's Day" is a recognition of his lordship over time and occupation, it is not made a rest-day in behalf of any one denomination, nor is any one compelled to worship. Sunday laws have been justified by the Supreme Court so late as 1885, on hygienic and economic grounds. Natural law requires a rest-day once a week, and the day selected under majority rule, is the one that will serve for religion as well as rest.

But Baal's altar crowds God's altar aside in some churches, where the fault cannot be laid on king or pope. Baal worship represents devotion to the world and the flesh. It includes those described by Paul, "whose God is their belly." It includes those also whose devotion is to commercialism more than to any other nobler ism. From such Baalism many of our churches need to be cleansed. And let us first cleanse our own faithfully, yet kindly.

2. The heart-temple restored to God — WHEN THE BURNT-OFFERING BEGAN, THE SONG OF THE LORD BE-

God's direction and protection. It is the prodigal no longer hungry and ragged, but clothed and feasting. And so, fourth, repentance is consummated in the thank-offering, the thanksgiving feast of restored fellowship with God. Home again!

An old Welsh preacher, noted for his quaint sermons, was preaching upon Isaiah 45: 22. He said: "The text teaches us, first, that man is the wrong way, his face being where his back, and his back where his face should be. The text calls man to turn. You must understand, friends, that God never takes a man to heaven backwards. You must turn right about face."

Some hundred years ago or more, the German Baron von Stackelberg, who had been traveling through Thessalonica, was seized by Albanian bandits. Most earnestly he begged release, but all in vain. Except you give us 60,000 piastres upon this day week, we will tear your whole body to pieces, shouted their inhuman leader.

Von Stackelberg had but one alternative—without delay to write to his dear friend Haller. Haller answered the letter by coming himself to Albania, with 14,500 piastres, which he had borrowed for the ransom. But the pirates refused to take less than 60,000. "Then take myself," was Haller's noble response, "let me suffer, let my friend go free." So perfectly amazed, so deeply touched were the bandits, that they permitted both the friends to proceed at once to Athens.

The Story of Scrooby Manor House

AT AUSTERFIELD

Being the First Chapter of New England's History

By AMELIA E. BARR

THE GOOD SHIP "MAYFLOWER"

ONE of the most remarkable facts in the history of mankind is the constant tendency of great men, and of great events, to spring out of the most unlikely places; and though America is but a new thing on the face of the earth, the readers of this article may find in its public records plenty of instances to make good the assertion—that the cradle of its most famous men, and of its most remarkable occurrences, has most frequently been rocked in some obscure place, where no one would have thought of looking for it.

Glancing widely and casually for instances, we are at once struck with the generality of this rule as it regards great religious movements. Without touching the plentiful Biblical examples, we may remember that from the loneliness of the Arabian desert came Mahomet, and his faith and empire; from the arid plains of Picardy, Calvin and Calvinism; from the bare, misty mountains of Scotland, John Knox; from the little inland village of Epworth, Wesley and Methodism; and from the obscure and almost unknown hamlet of Scrooby, the first chapter of the first New England colonies, with its grand promise of religious and civic liberty. Yes, it was at Scrooby in Old England, that New England was born; and we may take this instance as the initial American example, that great men and great events do have a tendency to spring out of the most unlikely places.

Many Americans make a pilgrimage to old Boston, and stand reverently in the wonderful sacred aisles of Saint Botolph's; but few, if any, go a little further to the northwest, and find in a queer, out-of-the-way corner of Yorkshire, right on the border line of Nottinghamshire, a little market town called Bawtry; yet a mile and a half from Bawtry on the Nottinghamshire side, stands Scrooby; and a mile and a half from Bawtry on the Yorkshire side, stands Austerfield; both small villages of thatched cottages inhabited by farm rustics, but both vitally connected with the settlement of New England. For William Brewster came from Scrooby, and William Bradford came from Austerfield, and it was in Scrooby Manor House that Brewster, Bradford, Robinson, Richard Clifton and others, considered and devised the plans of their proposed religious commonwealth in the new land of America.

The settlement of Brewster at Scrooby was one of those "accidents" which are God's part in any affair. Brewster had been associated with Davison, the Secretary of State, but on his loss of office, Brewster received the appointment of postmaster at Scrooby, which was then one of the twenty-six post stations on the Great Northern Road to Scotland. Now a postmaster had, in those days, a very much more important duty to perform than at the present time. He was obliged to maintain a fine stud of horses, in order to supply the mail riders, the government couriers, and also private gentlemen riding post. It was likewise obligatory on him to keep a good inn for the convenience and comfort of travelers. Naturally, spacious premises were needed for such public service, so when William Brewster became postmaster at Scrooby, he leased the Manor House at that place.

It was a handsome house belonging to the Archbishops of York—"a great house standing within a moat—very ample, and all builded of timber, saving the front of the house that is of brick." The ascent was by a long flight of stone steps, and it had a renown, not only as an archiepiscopal residence, but also a dwelling in which royalty had more than once been entertained.

Just about the time that Brewster was made postmaster at Scrooby, Sandys the Archbishop of York—regardless of the claims of the Church—gave the Manor House to his son Sir Samuel Sandys, and from Sir Samuel Sandys, William Brewster leased it. But though on terms of good-will with this episcopal family of Sandys, Brewster was a Puritan of the strictest kind, and a Separatist or Congregationalist in his ideas of church government. He had been educated at Cambridge University, which at that day was "the breeder of Puritans," and so it was in the great hall of Scrooby Manor House that the Congregationalist Church of Scrooby first began to meet. Its pastor was the Rev. John Robinson, who may be called the founder of Congregationalism, a man of whom it is truly said, "he was the most learned, the most polished and modest spirit that ever that sect enjoyed."

The accession of John Robinson soon drew to the fold of the Scrooby Church William Bradford, a youth of great promise, living in the village of Austerfield. His own minister, the godly Richard Clifton, rector of Babworth, had been silenced by the Government for preaching Puritan doctrine; and, burning with indignation, Bradford, in spite of the temporal risk, declared himself a Congregationalist, joined the church at Scrooby, and soon became, through his great abilities and force of character, the guide of its members in all temporal matters, so that when they finally reached the

on the shore. Many were discouraged by these events, but before the end of the year all the stronger spirits—1,608 in number—had found their way to Amsterdam.

For eleven years they remained in Holland, under the charge of their pastor, John Robinson, but they were neither happy nor prosperous, and their hearts turned with longing to America—that New World which God had appointed to comfort the woes of the Old.

It was, however, a difficult matter to influence England from Holland, and they had almost despaired of doing so, when, in the fullness of their time of trial, the apparently unlikely incident of Brewster once leasing Scrooby Manor House from the Sandys' family, brought forth the result God had foreseen, but which no man could have predicted. Sir Edwin Sandys became the treasurer—and afterwards governor—of the Virginia Company, and then Brewster found no difficulty in procuring from his old friendly landlord the promise of a free soil on which they might live socially as Englishmen, and not as subjects of the Dutch, yet enjoying the fullest liberty to worship God according to their convictions and desires. So then, in two distinct ways, out of Scrooby came the greatness of America.

Brewster and Bradford went to England to confer with Sandys, obtained from him a tract of land in America, and then one hundred of the bravest spirits sailed on the ship Mayflower for the "Land of Promise." Among this number were Brewster, Bradford, Carver and Winslow. Brewster, the founder of the church at Scrooby, was for twenty-four years a leader at Plymouth, and the colony doubtless owed much of its success to his unflagging energy and cheerful optimism. Bradford, at thirty-two years of age, was called to fill the important office left vacant by the death of Governor Carver, and, with the exception of five years, he was the chief magistrate of the colony until the year of his death, in 1657, a period of thirty-seven years.

The Good pastor Robinson remained with the weaker members in Holland "until the way should be opened for them," but before this was plain he died, and was buried in Leyden in the Peter's Church, where there is a beautiful bronze memorial in his honor. And fortunate indeed is that church who can claim as their founder a man so pure and so perfect in every good work as John Robinson, the first minister of the Pilgrim Fathers.

This beginning of the history of the New England colonies was fully written out by Governor Bradford and the MSS. deposited in the Old South Church, in Boston, from which place it disappeared during the War of the Revolution, and though often sought, was not found again until the year 1855, when it was discovered in the Fulham Library, at London, England. How long it had been there and by whom deposited, no one is able to tell us. But it is enough that the precious record is now in the care of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and that, therefore, such an interesting chapter of history is saved for all time; for without this Scrooby chapter, the facts respecting the first New England settlement would have been shrouded in myths and traditions, as is the case with the majority of old Eastern nations.

Come now, and let us picture to ourselves this ancient Manor House at Scrooby, so fairly builded of huge timbers and faced with brick—its two courts, its moat, its great stairway of stone leading to the "very ample entrance." If our imagination is good, we may restore to our comprehension the stables full of fine horses, the stir of the coming posts and couriers, the traveling shores of New England, he was the natural civil head of the community, and is deservedly honored by all succeeding generations as Gov. William Bradford of New Plymouth.

As it was the gathering place of all the Congregationalists from the surrounding villages, Scrooby Church soon became a large and important body, and its persecution was, therefore, certain and imminent. Bradford and the leading men were preparing for emigration to some part of America, when they suddenly discovered that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were intending their arrest, and that, therefore, fines and imprisonment awaited them. There was no time for American preparations, and they engaged two ships to take them to Holland. The Dutch captains of both ships played them false; one delivered his load of passengers to the civil power, the other sailed away when only half their number had been taken on board, and left a crowd of helpless women and children distracted

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D., Author of "In His Steps"

CHAPTER I

THE Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., Pastor of the Saint Cecilia Metropolitan Church, slowly took up his pen and wrote finis on the last page of a book manuscript. He then pushed his chair away from his desk, and leaned back in it for a moment in silence.

The clock in the church tower struck twelve. When the last stroke had sounded, the minister rose, walked over to the window of his study, which overlooked the small strip of lawn beside the church wall, and stood there a moment.

He then went back to his desk and knelt in front of it, putting his face on the manuscript as he knelt; when he finally raised his head his face was wet with tears and his lips still moved in an inaudible prayer.

The Rev. Fredrick Stanton was not yet fifty years old, and he was unmarried. He was handsome, intellectual, and lovable. There was no reason that could be given by any one in the parish of Saint Cecilia why the brilliant preacher of the most aristocratic church in Lenox did not marry one of the fair and rich members of his splendidly dressed congregation. But the fact remained that he did not, and no one had ever dared to ask him for the reason.

Two other qualities which made the Rev. Fredrick Stanton popular and esteemed, were his unquestioned affection for little children, and a habit of sadness which gave not a mournful but interesting cast to features which were classical in repose and intensely modern in action.

The book which he had just finished was his first effort. Whether it be his best or not, an author's first book is an event which brings a particular and peculiar emotion to the heart and mind. He never has the same feeling for another effort. The minister looked at the last page of his manuscript with an affectionate regard. The experience was new to him. The moment was, however, significant for other reasons.

He was about to send this book out to a publisher under an assumed name. The volume represented to him the best ten years of his life. It represented more than that. It stood for his heart's faith, for the real conviction which, during the ten years of its construction, had risen in him into a tremendous passion, that not a man or woman in all his parish dreamed of. To send the book out and withhold its real authorship was crucifixion to him. Yet, as he walked back and forth, he was not at any time in doubt concerning the matter—he knew what he was purposing to do, and he knew just how he would act.

He had not yet given the manuscript a title. With a deliberate but not a hesitating gesture, he now turned over to the first chapter which lay on the desk, and wrote across the upper part of the first page the following:

"THE CHRISTIAN SOCIALIST."

After another moment of silent contemplation of the manuscript, he wrote the following letter to the largest publishing house in the United States:

Dear Sirs—I send you by express, book manuscript entitled

THE CHRISTIAN SOCIALIST.

Very truly yours,

Lenox, June 1, 1896.

MARK BURNS.

He then ran through the chapters again, making a few slight changes. His handwriting was beautifully clear and strong, and the pages were, even to his own eyes, pleasant to look at. He then placed the chapters together again, put his letter on top of the first chapter, wrapped up the manuscript and directed it. The church clock struck the hour of one as he finished. The night was quiet. The Rev. Fredrick Stanton walked over to the window again and looked out. Then he came back to the desk, turned out his light and knelt at his chair for a long time. If any one had been in the room during that time he would have been astonished to hear from the brilliant, dignified, scholarly pastor of Saint Cecilia a prayer full of broken cries, appeals for pardon, confession for grievous fault, and promises of making full restitution. And he would also have been no less amazed after the prayer ceased to behold the minister rise, with haggard face and apparently unsatisfied heart, and seat himself at his desk once more, resting his head upon it until dawn came in, to find him still at his desk, the habitual sadness of his features marked by an added sternness of line, as the morning looked in upon his unrefreshed spirit.

That same day the manuscript was sent on to the great publishing house. Three days later, a printed form came back stating that the book had been received, and would be examined in due time. Then two months of silence. The Rev. Fredrick from time to time employed on the beautiful grounds surrounding the manse two, and sometimes three, men. "Mark Burns," whose address was the street number of the manse, might have been one of the men.

When the minister opened the next letter to "Mark Burns" he was alone in the manse seated in his study. He had been out calling that afternoon in his parish. His last call was at the beautiful residence of Judge Rodney. Mrs. Rodney and her daughter, Miss Mildred, were at home, and the conversation had at last turned upon the great strike threatened by the mill operatives in South Lenox.

"The men don't know what is good for them," Mrs. Rodney spoke sharply. Mrs. Rodney was a large and handsomely gowned woman, who wore several diamond rings and had limitless confidence in her own opinions of politics, business, and the church.

Her daughter Mildred was not quite so positive as her mother; but she was a young woman with strong convictions and a natural leaning to the favored classes of society, and especially those classes that assembled within the strictly proper social atmosphere of the Church of Saint Cecilia.

"Of course," Mrs. Rodney continued, "I don't object to fair wages for the working people. But it is simply preposterous that they should demand so much. The recent disturbances in the labor world are due to envy of the upper classes. The mill operatives are becoming unbearable. They are no longer satisfied with comfortable homes. They begin to cry out for luxuries."

"Do you think mill operatives ought not to have any luxuries, mother?" asked Miss Mildred, looking first at her mother, then at the Rev. Fredrick. When Miss Rodney spoke like that, the minister always gave her an inquiring glance, as if in doubt about something serious.

Mrs. Rodney waved her jeweled hand gracefully.

"Of course they are entitled to what they need. But where will their demands cease? Give them what they ask now, and in a year or two they will come back after more. I say it is getting to be preposterous. The working people are demanding as much as—"

"As we do," suggested the Rev. Fredrick, with a faint smile, speaking to the mother but looking at the daughter.

"Of course there must always be classes in society," Mrs. Rodney continued. "The governing classes need certain things in the way of luxuries to minister to their state of development. The lower classes can and should be contented with less. I have always noticed, for instance, that when one of my hired girls begins to get ambitious for better clothes, for finer wall paper on her room, she begins to grow slack with her work, and invariably I have to dismiss her. The working people should be taught to keep their place. That is the reason I say this strike is unwarranted; and I agree with Judge Rodney, that the working people are their own worst enemies when they attempt to claim more than they are capable of assimilating."

"Mother subscribed for The Ladies' Repository for our last cook," Miss Mildred spoke, looking out of an amused pair of gray eyes at the minister; "and what do you think the result was?"

"I have no idea," replied the Rev. Fredrick, cautiously.

"The cook came to mother one day and wanted to know who her dressmaker was."

"I should call that a compliment to your mother," replied the Rev. Fredrick, without the hint of a smile on his expressive face.

"It was the height of insolence on the cook's part," Mrs. Rodney said, a little stiffly. "It was another instance, and I have never known them to fail, of the mistake made when we attempt to elevate or encourage the working people. It makes them envious and dissatisfied. Let them know their place and keep it."

There was a little more talk along the same line, and the minister had at last come away after having listened more than he had talked, and bringing away with him, as he always did after meeting Miss Mildred Rodney, a very large interrogation mark in his mind concerning her real attitude towards life in general and his own life in particular.

Back in his study he found his mail on the desk, where his housekeeper had laid it, and he noticed first the letter directed to "Mark Burns."

He opened it at once, and read with growing excitement the following:

MR. MARK BURNS, LENOX:

Dear Sir—I am happy to state in behalf of the house, that your manuscript, The Christian Socialist, has been approved by our readers, and we shall be pleased to publish the book at the usual terms of ten per cent royalty. We shall be glad to hear from you at your earliest convenience in regard to the matter, and if you accept our conditions for publication, shall also be pleased to have your suggestions as to cover design or illustrations.

Very cordially yours,

C. B. M., for the firm--

New York.

In his reply to this note, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton wrote, accepting the terms made by the publishers, and enclosed a sketch of a cover design, leaving the matter of possible illustrations with the house. There was a glow of unusual pleasure in the thought that his book had been accepted by the firm. The only trace of disappointment felt at the time was a vague and undefined wonder at the absence of any criticism of the manuscript one way or the other. But he reflected as he penned his reply, that it was a purely business transaction, and the editor could not be expected to make extended remarks of approval on the host of manuscripts received and accepted.

There followed now for several weeks the receipt and correction of proof-sheets of the book, and early in the fall of that year the book itself came out, and one of the keenest delights of his whole life was experienced by him one day in October, when he received from the publishers half a dozen complimentary copies of his first published volume.

The cover design was a striking emblem, representing a gigantic hand squeezing the world, which was pictured as an orange from which ran drops of blood, which a closer examination revealed to the reader to be hearts, with despairing human faces on them, mostly of little children. The artist had put the design in colors of red and white. The vivid appearance of it as the book lay on his desk startled the Rev. Fredrick Stanton, and at first he questioned its good taste so strongly, that he was tempted to write a letter to the publisher, asking that if any further editions should be printed to have the design discontinued and the book issued in plain covers.

But after thinking it over, he decided to wait and let the public judge the matter, if, indeed, the public, in the shape of that uncertain quantity the "kind reader," should care enough about the book to look at the outside of it, to say nothing of actually buying and perusing it.

Within the next two months the Rev. Fredrick received from the New York publishers several newspaper book reviews of The Christian Socialist. They sounded to him suspiciously like advertisements sent out by the publisher, and although he was unfamiliar with such matters, he afterwards learned that his suspicions were correct. The book seemed destined to be unnoticed, unhonored and unread by the public, however, spite of the publisher's glowing reviews, and as the holidays new near, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton buried his first-born in what he thought was an unresurrected state.

What was his intense surprise, therefore, to receive, week before Christmas, a congratulatory letter from the publishers, which ran something like this:

"We are happy to state that the sale of the Christian Socialist has gone into the third edition, and the demand daily increasing for large orders."

This was, as stated, a week before Christmas. During the next three weeks the papers began to call attention to the new and startling story called The Christian Socialist. Magazines wrote long literary reviews of it.
Religious journals bitterly, and in most cases savagely, criticized it. People talked about the book at social gatherings. They discussed it at religious conventions, they read it on the cars, they took sides for and against teachings, and on all sides asked concerning its authorship.

Even the conventional parish of Saint Cecilia caught the contagion of the public mania for The Christian Socialist. It actually read the book through, and even went so far as to discuss it. On nearly every library table in the elegant homes of his rich parishioners, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton grew daily accustomed to the milliard design of the gigantic hand and the blood-red orange world.

There was practically only one opinion in the parish of Saint Cecilia concerning The Christian Socialist, and it was voiced emphatically by Mrs. Rodney one afternoon in the latter part of February, while the pastor of Saint Cecilia was making a parish call.

"The most dangerous book ever written!" Mrs. Rodney declared, tapping the volume decisively with the tips of her jeweled fingers. It will, to my mind, go far towards inflaming the public mind to deeds of violence. I should not be surprised if this book led to a bloody revolution. I actually saw a copy of it in the hands of one of the strikers this afternoon, as I was coming back from South Lenox in the trolley. He was scussing it in a very excited manner with another man beside him. The author is evident—"

At that moment Judge Rodney came to the drawing-room. All the parlors of the parish of Saint Cecilia were drawing-rooms."

He greeted the minister cordially and asked inquiringly at his wife.

"I was just saying," Mrs. Rodney continued, "that this book is the most dangerous book ever published, and, in my opinion, it will inflame the public mind to deeds of violence."

"Oh! The Christian Socialist," Judge
Rodney exclaimed, with an air of interest. "A remarkable book, Mr. Stanton. But I agree with Mrs. Rodney—most dangerous. It attacks the foundations of society. Of course you have read the book. What do you think of it?"

"We have been looking for a sermon on the book," Mildred interrupted.
Nearly every other minister in Lenox has preached on it."

"You know I seldom preach book reviews," said the minister with a smile, and at that moment Judge Rodney was called out of the room by a messenger, and the Rev. Fredrick did not answer his question. Mrs.
Rodney, however, repeated it.

"What do you think of the book, Dr. Stanton?"

"I am not a very good judge of such books, Mrs.
Rodney, and do not know that I am capable of giving an opinion."

"You are too modest," Mrs. Rodney replied, a trifle apolly. If there was one unpardonable sin to her, it was the sin of not having positive opinions. "At heart you will agree with Judge Rodney and me, that the book is dangerous in the extreme." She took the minister's silence for consent, and added: "If I were the Russian government in this country, I would suppress this book by law."

"Therefore, mother, getting it read by more people than are reading it now," said Miss Mildred, carelessly.

"Oh, as to that, I differ. To my mind, the only way to deal with heresy, is to stamp it out with a strong hand."

Mrs. Rodney mixed her metaphors as a toper would mix a drink—for her own sake alone, and regardless of any one else's taste. After expressing herself thus, she suddenly excused herself to answer some call from a servant, leaving the minister and Miss Mildred alone, together. It was not the first time, and the Rev. Fredrick did not seem to be disturbed over it.

"What do you think of The Christian Socialist, Dr.
Stanton?" Miss Mildred asked, as her mother went out of the room.

"Is my opinion worth anything?"

"In this case, yes."

"I think the story is interesting."

"That is not an opinion."

"What is it?"

"Merely a statement."

"What do you want me to say?"

"What you believe, of course."

"Does it make any difference whether I answer or not?"

"It is for you to judge," Miss Mildred answered; but there was a flash in her eyes that the Rev. Fredrick could interpret in any one of several ways.

"Well, then, Miss Rodney, I am not prepared to express an opinion on the book."

"You mean you cannot?"

The minister was silent.

"Or you will not?" further persisted Miss Mildred.

"I HAVE BEEN A COWARD IN THE PULPIT," SAID
THE REV. FREDRICK STANTON. "I AM THE AUTHOR."

The Rev. Fredrick was silent still, yet his silence did not seem discourteous.

"Or you dare not?" Miss Mildred shot the last arrow in her quiver, and it went home.

"It is for you to say," he finally answered, looking at her gravely.

"I do not claim the last word, Dr. Stanton."

She picked up the book from the table where her mother had laid it when she went out, and turned its pages as if the minister were not in the room. He did not break the silence, as if he knew she would speak.
Finally she began to read out loud.

"Page 127. 'Janet accepted him as her lover and husband without a single question. Although he had lived a life of conscious cowardice and she knew it, at this crisis in his career she forgot and forgave so utterly that her act was redemptive for him, and he permitted the sacrifice on her part without remonstrance.'"

Miss Mildred Rodney lifted her eyes from the book and looked steadfastly at the minister.

"No woman like Janet Arnold could ever love a coward."

"How do you know?" he asked, unexpectedly.

She seemed confused by the question and did not answer at once. The Rev. Fredrick had never before seen the fair Miss Mildred lose her self-possession.

"A girl like Janet Arnold would not," she repeated weakly.

"But to my mind," the Rev. Fredrick said slowly,
"the character of Janet Arnold in the book seems to be taken from your own."

"Do you think so?" Miss Mildred asked, in a low tone.

"I was struck with the resemblance all along."

"But I would not act like that; I could not love a coward."

"But was the man a coward at the last?"

"Once a coward always one."

"Do you want me to argue the matter?"

"No; the story has many faults. Still, shall I confess, it made me cry."

He looked at her in wonder. When had any man ever seen the proud Mildred shed a tear. But as she raised her eyes again, the minister for a moment fancied he could detect an unwonted dimness in their regular clear, clear, gray depths.

"It made you cry?"

"Yes; I wonder who 'Mark Burns' can be. I should like to know him. I would ask him if I resembled Janet Arnold."

When the Rev. Fredrick Stanton reached the manse after his parish calls were over, he found a telegram on his desk. It was from the New York publishers:

"The Christian Socialist to-day passed its One Hundred Thousandth sold copy.
Congratulations."

He stared at the yellow paper hardly grasping the significant item. Four weeks later another telegram announced:

"Book selling 1,000 copies a day. Unparalleled demand rapidly increasing."

This was the latter part of March. By the first of May The Christian Socialist had leaped to the front of all the books of the day, and its sales exceeded three hundred thousand copies, with no indications of any slackening of interest on the part of either the buying or the reading public. The papers still discussed the story, the religious press still bitterly assailed it, the pulpit continued to preach about it, workingmen's organizations passed resolutions upon it, pyramids of it still loomed up in the book stores and on the railroad news-stands, and, contrary to all precedent, the book gained in steady sales as summer advanced, and a congratulatory letter to "Mark Burns" in the latter part of May, announced that all other publications issued by the firm were practically set aside in order to supply the enormous orders that were pouring in from all parts of the country, and from Europe as well.

It was a week after this letter came that a visitor called at the manse one afternoon. The Rev. Fredrick Stanton was out in his parish somewhere, but the well-dressed stranger quietly told the housekeeper that he would wait. He was shown into the minister's study, and sat there evidently deeply interested in everything he saw until the minister entered the room.

The minute he appeared, the visitor rose to greet him with a smile.

"Dr. Stanton?"

"Yes."

"In other words, 'Mark Burns.'"

The Rev. Fredrick was silent, but he observed his visitor intently.

"You will have to pardon this intrusion," said the visitor with another smile. "I am the junior member of the firm of —, of New York, and I have come to Lenox to see the author of the most remarkable book of the age; you cannot hide your light under that nom de plume any longer. The public clamors to know you.
Our New York office is besieged with letters from readers asking for photographs and autographs, and from lecture bureau agents asking for engagements. The newspapers are hot on your trail, and it has been nothing less than a miracle that you have not been found out and written up weeks before now. We want your photograph and life history for a new and specially prepared illustrated edition of the book, and I have come on to assist you in working up the material."

"What if I should refuse all that?" asked the Rev. Fredrick slowly.

"Refuse! But, my dear sir, it is impossible! The public must be appeased. It will not be possible to maintain this secrecy any longer."

"Why not? George Eliot was not known as the author of Adam Bede for years. It was five years before Charles Egbert Craddock was known to be a woman. The author of Ecce Deus, Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, did not disclose the fact of the authorship of that book for more than ten years after it was published, and it was discussed by the people in his own church, who never suspected that he was the author."

"But I should think, my dear sir, that you would wish to be known. There never was such a sale of a book in this country. We have been obliged to discontinue every other publication to meet our orders. It is simply unprecedented in the history of the book business."

"Nevertheless, I do not wish to disclose my identity. I have my own reason for not wishing to be known as its author."

The publisher was silent for a moment.

"I doubt if you can maintain the secret. Of course, if that is your firm decision we shall do our utmost to respect it. You need have no fear of that." Then, after a moment of hesitation, he asked: "Is it—do you—that is, is this reason you have for not wishing to be known anything you can give to the firm?"

The Rev. Fredrick Stanton answered slowly. "It is not. The reason is one I have never disclosed."

The visitor bowed and soon after took his leave, promising again solemnly to respect "Mark Burns'" secret. When he had gone away the minister bowed his head upon his desk, and when he raised his head at last the habitual sadness of his face was deepened, and the whole man seemed depressed even at the moment of his highest fame, from which he apparently shrank as from an unwelcome visitor.

Summer faded into autumn and autumn whitened into winter, when the great event transpired which marked church history for Saint Cecilia for all its life to come. The Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., had been chosen from a large number of candidates in the churches as Bishop, to fill the position of one who had been removed by old age from the distinguished office. The ceremony of inducting him into the high place of honor was fitly performed in the magnificent audience-room of Saint Cecilia itself. The congregation assembled was remarkable for its aristocratic appearance, for the fine display of rich garments and the unquestioned high tone of its social standing. The array of distinguished guests and church officials and neighboring clergy, was imposing. The people of Saint Cecilia, while truly grieving over the loss of their scholarly, refined pastor, felt at the same time a natural pride at the honor conferred upon him. Judge and Mrs. Rodney and Miss Mildred sat near the altar rail in their accustomed pew, and when the newly-elected Bishop came out upon the platform to face his brother Bishop and answer to the Bishop's charge, he glanced toward the Rodney pew for a second. Then he fastened his eyes upon the Bishop, a venerable old man, with a clear and resonant voice, who, according to the ritual of the Church, faced the new Bishop and propounded to him the regular questions. As the Rev. Fredrick made his replies, although reading them from the printed manual, he seemed never to lower his eyes, and his face was grave, and Miss Mildred said to herself, unusually pale.

The venerable Bishop finished reading, closed the manual, and then, to the astonishment of the great assembly he did a thing unprecedented in the history of a Bishop's consecration. He proceeded to address the new Bishop in his own words, not outlined in the manual.

"Brother Fredrick Stanton, I feel it to be a part of my duty to-day to add somewhat of counsel to the words of the charge I have in the name of the Church just given to you. There is abroad to-day in the world a new spirit of so-called religious teaching, which is subversive of doctrine and especially dangerous to the Established Church. I refer to the rapidly growing heresy of Christian Socialism so called! I especially refer to that most dangerous and pernicious volume published in the guise of fiction, and called The Christian Socialist. Its teachings are a grave and growing menace to wealth and social distinctions, and if carried out they will place the Church in a precarious position, and render it necessary for her to abandon the established order of her system of instruction. As your elder in the Church, I feel moved to deliver to you, my brother, my earnest charge, that as you have thus far in your pulpit ministrations commended yourself to the Church as a wise and conservative leader in matters pertaining to doctrine and social order, you will now, with the added influence and power that have come to you with this high office, raise your voice and wield your pen in defence of the truths handed down from our fathers, and combat with all your intellect and soul the heresy of this dangerous social movement, and in particular the heresy of this popular volume, which has taken such strange and fateful hold upon the imagination of the common people, and in some cases upon the better-informed classes within the Church itself. If it were not to appear presumptuous even in one who is your elder many years, I would dare to suggest that it may be possible with your gifts of mind and imagination, you might be led to combat this most dangerous book of the present age with a volume which you might be able to construct. However that may be, my brother, solemnly charge you, will you to the utmost of your great ability, combat in private and in public the growing heresy of Christian Socialism. Do you so promise by the grace of God?"

During this impromptu address, Mrs. Rodney sat breathless listener, together with all the others in the great concourse. At first she had felt like strong disapproving such a departure from the established order of the manual; but after the first two sentences she leaned forward with a smile of hearty approval of her determined face. The Judge looked pleased. Miss Mildred never withdrew her look from the new Bishop's countenance.

"He is going to faint," she said in a half whisper, the words of the venerable Bishop ceased, and silence unbroken by the new Bishop followed, of such duration that Miss Mildred Rodney feared her mother would be sharply conscious of a rapid heart-beat close beside her.

Slowly, very slowly, the Very Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., newly-elected and now-to-be consecrated Bishop, turned a little towards the congregation:

"I have a statement to make," he said, in a tone so low that the people in the back part of the church asked what he said. But as he turned again and faced his venerable colleague, his voice rose in power until it filled with carrying force the farthest corner of the large room.

"My first statement is this: For twenty-five years have been a coward in the pulpit. My second is this: I am the author of The Christian Socialist, and its teachings are my heart beliefs."

All over the Church of Saint Cecilia a gasp of astonishment rose.

Ex-President Cleveland on Riches

AT the recent laying of the cornerstone of the new Hebrew Technical School for Girls in New York City, Ex-President Grover Cleveland made the principal address. Speaking of the great works that are now accomplished by benevolent men and women, he said:

"It is not altogether a fanciful or pessimistic notion that leads many of our patriotic and sincere citizens to lament the growth among us of materialism. Our people are undoubtedly becoming more and more infected with a feverish desire to accumulate wealth and to succeed in undertakings far removed from philanthropic intentions; but no one can yet say that in the midst of all this there does not remain to us charity for the poor, pity for the sick or wounded, and a helping hand for those who need aid in the improvement of their present conditions and future prospects. We who are here have before us at this moment convincing evidence that these ennobling traits of our national disposition have not been entirely smothered in a heedless rush for riches.

"Thoughtful men must also regretfully concede that, even in the best and highest civilization, movements called charitable and benevolent are sometimes used to cloak self-exploitation and purse-proud vanity, or are set on foot to satisfy the whims and caprice of the restless rich. It is a matter of common observation, too, that projects really benevolent in motive and purpose are frequently so ill-considered and so impractical in their management that they are not only wasteful of money and effort, and fall short of the good they should accomplish, but by their misguided and careless ministrations often extinguish among their beneficiaries all desire and incentive for self-respect and self-effort, and thus recruit the ranks of willing mendicancy.

"Public appropriation and private charity are mindful of men and women in poverty, sickness and distress; orphan girls and boys are compassionately cared for and fed, clothed and sheltered; but it was an inspiration of genuine benevolence which led to the discovery of a different field of humane endeavor, and to the establishment of an agency for good which goes further than to furnish the objects of its care with food and raiment.

"The beneficent undertaking we contemplate grew out of the initiative of a single man, who saw that wealth brings with it obligations of benevolence and charity, and that its best contribution to the happiness of its possessor is the opportunity it affords of doing good. That his efforts have been efficiently seconded by others likewise nobly disposed is proved by an extension of the field of activity and the enlargement of facilities inaugurated to-day.

"Let us go from this place wishing for the new home the perpetual dedication to glorious mission; and, with the nobility of doing good impressed upon us, let us resolve that in a sphere narrow or broad as our lives have been cast, we, too, will do something for humanity."

What it is to be a Christian

PERMIT me to say a few encouraging words to one of your readers. My friend, to be a Christian is to have the indwelling of the Holy Spirit within us; to step out of self and into Christ; to lose sight of our own insignificance while beholding the majesty of his atonement, his love, his death, his pardon, his resurrection and intercession.

Religion is a practical, personal, individual matter; therefore, when we enter the house of God, it is to meet him; to feed our souls upon the sustenance of his holy Word; to commune with him; to rise above all worldly considerations and not to consider the moods and tempers of the congregation of people around us. As long as our own heart is right, the spiritual condition of a concourse of people will give us no uneasiness, knowing as we do that God we are responsible and not to man and their frivolous or vicious conduct is slighting us, would cause us to despise their religious hypocrisy and to pursue our own way undisturbed. You couldn't please the devil better than by turning your back on your own church; you couldn't do yourself spiritually a greater injury than by turning your back on your Creator because there were wolves in the fold. God makes the church, not the people; they make the congregation. As professor of faith in Jesus Christ, you are as much entitled to a seat in your own church, and to all the rights and privileges of the band of Christians that worship there, as your minister who occupies the pulpit. Remember what our blessed Saviour said: "I give unto my sheep eternal life; they shall none perish; neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." If you love Christ, trust him, and serve him you are his, and all the churches in Christendom cannot harm you, or separate you from him. If you want Christian advice apply to some elderly Christian.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Girls and the Home

A PHRASE, to me repellent, has crept into our common speech, and seems to have rooted itself firmly in colloquial use. The term, bachelor-maid, was coined by somebody who felt the need of a pictorial way to describe the girl who does not care to marry, and who is able to stand on her own feet, support herself, and live in a certain independence of the other sex. If our girls of to-day could appreciate the difference in public opinion that has gradually come to pass in a generation, they would be properly grateful. Time was, and not so long ago either, that a girl's chief dread was that she might not be sought in marriage until she had become passee, until people called her an old maid. The condition of an old maid was often one of clinging like a withered leaf to the family tree. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes thus described it in his little poem: "My aunt; my dear, unmarried aunt."

Everything has changed with the entrance of young women on bread-winning in various callings, and with the development of liberal education for women. No girl need now tremble if she elect to remain single, nor need any girl adopt the objectionable and silly name already alluded to. She is a maiden, not a bachelor, and a bachelor-maid is a misnomer. As well might her unmarried cousin or brother label himself a maid-bachelor, which nobody will ever catch him doing.

Though a girl support herself and spend the larger part of her daylight in an office, or behind a counter, she never drifts altogether from the home relation, which means more to the daughters of the house than to the sons.

She never loses the love of domesticity. In her own room, there are sure to be feminine fancies, pretty knick-knacks, photographs and souvenir cards. She frames little pictures and hangs them on her wall. She tries to surround herself with color and beauty. She has a tea-table, cups and saucers, and a jar of biscuits for an impromptu meal. This is if she lives alone. No boarding-house robs a girl's own little room, though it be a hall bed-room three pairs back, of its pretty and dainty individuality.

If at home with her parents, the wage-earning girl, whether saleswoman, stenographer, or bookkeeper, slips naturally into the place of the home-helper at evening. If a teacher, or a trained nurse, or a doctor, she does not forget how to beat up a cake, or mend a pair of stockings, or arrange a dinner-table, when she happens to be at home. Woman's mission to comfort, to counsel, to direct, to assist, belongs to the girl, just as much and just as really when she is a business-person as when she is at home, shielded from every rough wind.

The girl does not lose her home-stamp because she goes to business. Far from it. At her desk, or her typewriter, she is still so womanly, that the corner where she sits has a sweet home-i-ness; so that she prevents by her simple presence the utterance of rough words, or profanity, or anything indelicate. Into the business world, unwittingly, she brings the refinement and the peace that ever surround the true woman.

For this reason, among others, the girl in business needs to keep herself very strictly, during business hours, to whatever is the duty of the hour. She must be absorbed, and impersonal. She is not, in her capacity of a wage-earner, a young lady of leisure, nor the object of attentions from gentlemen, nor has she at that time the privileges of free conversation, of expressing her opinions, and of dictating terms to her little world, which are hers in her home and in society. She is not to receive or look for compliments and concessions. She is a woman earning her salary, and not a princess accepting homage.

The girl at home, on the other hand, occupies a unique and enviable position. Her father defers to her, her mother consults her, her brothers and sisters look up to her with devoted admiration. Every possible indulgence is granted her freely. She is chaperoned when she goes abroad, because she is too precious to be allowed to suffer risk or peril. Also, if very young, she may often be suddenly placed in some situation where it is unfair to her that she should decide a matter, and her mother or an older friend can much better take the responsibility.

Dear girls, if only you knew it, you are the dearest and most prized treasures of your homes. You have your problems, you are sometimes blue, you are sometimes worried, because you feel that you are misunderstood. But girlhood is a beautiful time, a time of enchantment; and girls are beautiful beings, whom we all love. Write to me if I can help you. MOTHER'S THANKSGIVING PIES

The New England housewife takes pride in her preparations for Thanksgiving, and nothing delights her heart more than the making of those wonderful pumpkin pies. With what care she selects the great golden globes, and, finding one that is just right in color, size and consistency, then how carefully must the other ingredients be selected. The freshest of eggs and milk, beaten and strained, the combination of spices blended, with just a touch of "essence" of lemon and rose. Then the crust, how carefully it must be mixed and manipulated, and there must be no uneven baking. To be sure, there are other kinds of toothsome dainties associated with Thanksgiving, but not one of these quite equals the golden pumpkin pie.

envelope, I will answer myself, if it comes from a girl who reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Wedding in the Clouds

Romantic couples select all sorts of places to be married in. We have known a happy pair to stand in a row-boat while the minister married them from the shore, and to sit in a phaeton, while the officiating clergyman was stationed on the side of the road. But Miss Estella Clayton, of Wayne County, Missouri, and Mr. Martin Good, of New York City, have surpassed all others in the lofty altitude chosen for their October wedding, at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. The two young people, on the top of the great Ferris Wheel, 285 feet above the spectators below, went through the ritual with perfect composure, and did not lose their heads, though the height was bewildering, and the daring somewhat reckless. This mention of the wedding is not given that any one may emulate it, but simply to show the presence of mind of Mr. and Mrs. Good. A little company of friends ventured with them to the dizzy height, and stood beside them on top of the car. After a safe descent the newly-married pair started on a wedding journey.

Echoes of an Elder Day

LOOKING over the pages of Mrs. Alice Morse Earle's superb work, Two Centuries of Costume in America, I have been impressed with the rich and sumptuous styles affected by our forefathers.

Men used to wear costly and elegant costumes, far finer than those they now deem fitting. They spared no expense on their raiment, which was of satin, or corded silk, velvet, or the very finest broadcloth, trimmed with gold embroidery, and finished with ruffles of costly lace. The most minute directions were sent across the sea to the London tailors and haberdashers, and nothing was too small for the general, or the governor, to dwell upon with pride and care when ordering a new wardrobe.

Ladies, at one period, wore magnificent headdresses in an Oriental mode, and many of the beautiful matrons whom Gilbert Stuart painted, sat to him with their fair heads adorned with turbans of gauze, mull or silk.

It is amusing to find wigs in vogue about 1804. Every woman under seventy had her hair sheared close to her head, and then covered the clipped scalp-locks with a becoming wig. This fashion succeeded a season of elaborate hairdressing, when the hair was built up in many artificial and uncomfortable ways.

Miss Eliza Southgate, writing to her mother in 1800, asks for one of the new adornments in a very lively letter:

"Now, mamma, what do you think I am going to ask for—a wig. Eleanor has got a new one, just like my hair, and only five dollars. Mrs. Mayo one just like it. I must either cut my hair, or have one. I cannot dress it at all stylish. Mrs. Coffin bought Eleanor's, and says that she will write to Mrs. Sumner to get me one just like it—how much time it will save; in one year we could save it in pins and paper, besides the trouble. At the assembly I was quite ashamed to my head, for nobody has long hair. If you will consent to my having one, do send me over a five-dollar bill by the post, immediately after you receive this."

Girls in 1800 were not very different from girls a century later. They could fancy anything pretty that had the fiat of a new fashion to recommend it.

Fashion revolves from century to century, and from time to time the oldest fashions are revived.

The Rest-Day Congress

A significant feature of the St. Louis Exposition has been its large convocations of Christian workers. The Sunday-Rest Congress was interesting and unique, especially in the earnest spirit manifested by those who long to preserve holy the Sabbath day. Of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff, Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts and Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster were elected on the Executive Committee. The Honorary President was the Honorable John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, while the Rev. Dr. William S. Hubbell, of New York, was President.

Avoid Firearms at Home

Except in times of war, firearms are best avoided. On Hallowe'en night, a man in New Jersey, wishing to frighten a crowd of roistering intruders on his lawn, fired a revolver over their heads. The ball deflected and struck a little fellow of fourteen, a neighbor's son, not with the offending parties, and almost instantly killed him. Two families are plunged into the deepest grief, and the sorrow of the accidental slayer will be unending. The moral is, omit pistols from your household furniture.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

TILLIE.—I cannot advise you about your hair. Consult a specialist. Use nothing that is even remotely a dye.

DOROTHY.—Gloves may be cleaned by using naphtha; but it must not be used in a room where there is a fire or a lighted lamp.

MIRIAM.—At a formal dinner the host gives his arm to the lady who is the most honored guest. It is quite proper, however, to go to dinner without any special formality.

M. C.—In England and in most parts of the United States, it is not good form to say "Yes, Ma'am" and "No, Ma'am," when addressing an older person. Very elegant men and women observe this form in the Southern States. They say "Yes, Ma'am," "No, Ma'am," and "Please, Ma'am." With us this manner of speech is reserved for inferiors addressing superiors in station. Children are taught to say "Yes, mother," etc., and to answer other persons with "Yes, Mrs. —," "No, Mr. —."

A WOMAN CLERGYMAN ✧ OUR GUEST FROM JAPAN

ON 29th September last, the Rev. Gertrude von Petzold was installed as pastor of the Free Christian Church at Leicester, England. Miss von Petzold is the first woman to be ordained in England as pastor of a church. Her call to Leicester aroused the greatest interest in the community. While it was not an unheard-of thing there that a woman should occupy a pulpit, yet it had never happened that a member of her sex had really taken a position permanently as pastor of a church.

Miss von Petzold is of German parentage. She was born at Thorn, in the year 1876, and is the daughter of a Prussian officer. She received her preparatory education at Stettin. At the age of eighteen she took the teachers' examination. Animated by a desire to receive also an academic degree she went to Scotland, where she spent the next two years in study at St. Andrews. Then she went to Edinburgh, where she took the degree of M. A. Next she turned her attention to theology, and went first to Oxford, after which she attended lectures at the University of Berlin, where, among others, Harnack v. Soden and the philosopher Paulsen were her teachers. After more than three years of theological study Fraulein von Petzold decided to accept the call to the Free Christian Church at Leicester. At her recent installation to the office a large congregation assembled. The installation ceremony was conducted by the Rev. W. Whitaker of Cardiff, the predecessor of the new pastor.

Miss von Petzold is a woman of graceful presence and with a fine address. She has an earnestness of manner that easily captures the attention of her audience. There is in the auspicious opening of her work the promise of a most helpful and effective ministry.

HIS Imperial Highness, Prince Sadanaru Fushimi, has arrived in this country, having reached San Francisco on November 9. He goes to Washington on "a personal mission of friendship," it is said, from the Mikado. As a member of the army, the Prince is debarred from discussing military affairs, and, therefore, declines being interviewed. The former Minister of Japan to Mexico, A. Sato, heads the Imperial suite. He declares the Prince's visit to be one of pure courtesy, as the personal representative of the Emperor to our President, to express the high regard of the Japanese for the United States, and to further the friendship which already exists between the two nations.

Prince Fushimi is not a brother of the Mikado; he is not even a cousin to His Majesty; but the princely house of Fushimi is proud to call this brave soldier their head. At the outbreak of the war with Russia, the Prince went to the front, commanding the first division of the Imperial Guard. His exploits during the Korean campaign were such as to bring him into great prominence, but it was at the storming of Nan-Shan Heights that Fushimi showed himself a warrior of great courage. For hours at a time he was under fire, directing all the movements, which resulted in victory, but at a fearful cost.

Prince Fushimi's physical characteristics would not mark him as distinctly Japanese, he somewhat resembles the Italian or Roumanian nationality. He has closely-cut, iron-gray hair, and is exceedingly pleasant and courteous in manner. He is a fine horseman, having learned to ride in a French cavalry school. The Prince speaks French and German fluently, but no English. As this very energetic soldier seemed to have a faculty for getting himself and his division into the very hottest places on the battle-field, it was deemed prudent to withdraw him from the front, after he had been slightly wounded.

The Prince, who married a daughter of the noble family of Arisingawa, has three children. The first-born is a young naval officer, serving in Admiral Togo's fleet.

Although there may not be any official importance attaching to Prince Fushimi's visit to America, yet he will be accorded all the attention due to his rank. There will be a grand reception at the Japanese legation in Washington, and the Prince will be invited to dine at the White House.

THE CANADIAN ELECTION

OUR friends across the border appear to have decided to "let well enough alone." Sir Wilfrid Laurier's majority is increased from fifty-four to seventy-two. The Conservative leader, Mr. Robert L. Borden, not only failed to carry the country for his policy, but failed to retain his own seat. Ontario elected forty Liberals and forty-six Conservatives; Quebec, fifty-five Liberals and ten Conservatives, and Nova Scotia, eighteen Liberals.

There were two issues between the parties. The first, which concerns outsiders, was on the question of preferential tariffs for Great Britain, and the second, affecting Canadians only, was on the Government ownership of railroad. On the first of these issues Sir Wilfrid Laurier was non-committal, and his opponents said he was half-hearted. He pledged himself, however, to hold an inquiry after the election and to formulate a tariff according to its findings. It was generally believed that on principle he objected to Mr. Chamberlain's scheme, which he believed would increase the cost of living, without bringing any material advantage to the Government or people of Canada. The essence of Mr. Chamberlain's scheme is that Canada should admit British manufactures free, or at a reduced tariff, in return for which Great Britain should impose a duty on foreign imports of food, other than those that came from Canada, thus giving Canada a preference in the British markets. Sir Wilfrid Laurier does not positively reject the scheme, but it is said by his opponents that he gives it but a half-hearted support. The Conservatives, on the other hand, were frankly in favor of a higher tariff.

The second issue refers to the line of railroad which is to connect the eastern with the western coast. The Conservative programme required the money to construct to be raised by the sale of bonds guaranteed by the Government, with the distinct proviso that the Dominion should own the line with its branches and terminals. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's plan is for the Government to build the eastern section of the road, which runs from Winnipeg to Moncton, New Brunswick. This section to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific for a term of fifty years, the Company paying nothing for the first seven years, and after that period three per cent. on its cost. This is on condition that the Company construct the western portion of the road from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast, the Government guaranteeing three-fourths of the bonds. The Government also agreeing to pay interest on three-fourths of the mountain section of the road for seven years. The Conservative leader, Mr. Borden, contended that this scheme was practically giving a road built by the people over to the Company for an inadequate payment. The issue of the election, in which the rival schemes were exhaustively discussed, appears to indicate that Sir Wilfrid Laurier's plan is approved by the people.

BISHOP VINCENT

Miss Mary Reed and the Lepers

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have shown a kindly sympathy for Miss Mary Reed and her devoted work, will be interested in learning that she has recently returned to India, after a period of rest in the Holy Land. The special malady that has set her apart for twelve years to work among the lepers is fortunately still held in check, and her general health has been somewhat restored by change of scene and climate. It is not yet decided when, or whether, she will return to her former post at Chandag Heights, India, but in any case, she will not do so for a few months longer. Meanwhile, her work is being efficiently carried on, and recent reports tell of a number of baptisms among the lepers at her station.

The general work of the Mission is developing rapidly, and is full of encouragement. During the past two years the Mission to Lepers has added sixteen new asylums and homes, and is now entirely responsible for the maintenance of twelve of these institutions, besides giving considerable help to thirty-six others. The gratitude of the lepers for all that is done for them was expressed by one of the inmates of our asylum near Moullmain. When asked if he had any message to send to the friends at home, he said: "What can we say, but that we are grateful? We are well fed, well clothed, well housed—what more could they do for us?"

JOHN JACKSON.

ACCEPTABLE WORSHIP*

How important is this question of sincerity in worship, when from Christ's own statement, that it is only such who worship in spirit and in truth that are acceptable. The Bible abounds in warnings to those whose devotion are merely formal, that their worship and observance, if it is not sincere and genuine, is mere mockery. God looks upon the heart and knows how far the expressions of the lips and the bending of the knees represent true devotion. The worshiper whose life is given up to pleasure, or money-making, or worldly pursuits, cannot bring to God the offering of sincere devotion. The expressions of penitence and the heart is unrepentant; of desire for spiritual purity when there is no such desire; of love and reverence for God while the whole life is contrary to his commands, is simply an offence which is more than neglect of his worship altogether.

True worship does not demand perfection of life, otherwise who could enter into his presence? It demands humility. The Pharisee whose private life was doubtless better than that of the Publican, was rejected, because his prayer was defective in this quality. The sinful soul may worship in spirit and truth if it approaches God in sorrow, entreating his pardon and his help. Great sinners have been received, as was David, when there was a sincere desire in the heart for a better life. The sinner is not rejected because of his sin, but because he desires to continue in it. It is the honesty of purpose, the longing for a higher life, which constitute the acceptable worshiper. God's hand is extended to every one who approaches him seeking help, acknowledging impotence, and humbly pleading for divine guidance.

Acceptable worship must include not only sincerity, but truth. It is they who worship in spirit and in truth that God seeks to worship. The idolater might be very sincere, but mistaken as to the true nature of God. There should be an intelligent apprehension of what God is and of what he requires, and a diligent effort to reach the Godlike in character. The place of worship and the rites of worship are of less importance than these essential qualities.

There is in one of the Greek legends a curious legend indicating the character of worship. It is that at the door of a certain temple there was a mirror in which the worshiper could see the image of the god he came to worship. If a mirror were placed at the door of our churches, how many of them would reflect the mighty deity how many the idol of public opinion, how many the goddess of type and pleasure!

A pastor, rebuking one of his members for his absence from church, received a reply which showed that the absentee had apprehended the true nature of worship. "One of my men is ill," he said, "and his wife is at home nursing him. He does not belong to our church, but he is a sincere Christian. I found he was grievously ill because he could not attend service, so I go to see him every day and we pray and read the Bible together. His wife comes in too, and as she can sing, we have a little service of our own, as we are taught that 'where two or three are gathered in the name of Christ,' we make up the required number. I think I am worshipping God there as much as by going to church."

THE TRUE SHEPHERD

SEVERAL years ago, when ill-health compelled us to spend a few months in Cashmere, we, one day, made a march through a wild part of that fair land. The temperature was mild, and a gentle rain was falling. Scarcely a leaf stirred in the light breeze. Occasionally a bird sent forth a clear, sweet note. Our route brought us, at length, to a mountain torrent, across which stretched a narrow and apparently insecure bridge. A shepherd, with his crook over his shoulder, was a little in advance, leading his flock. When the bridge was reached, the shepherd planted his foot upon it, and the sheep nearest him, bleating piteously, essayed to follow, but started back as the frail crossing trembled under the pressure. The shepherd paused, looked back, and then called his flock to follow, taking at the same time a step or two forward to encourage the timid creatures. On the margin of the stream they stood, evidently much distressed, as the distance between them and the shepherd increased. At length one or two of the bolder ones, with great caution, planted their feet upon the bridge, and when the firm ground had been left behind them, closer and closer they pressed to the side of the shepherd, as if feeling that then and there alone was safety. Other sheep followed the braver leaders, and soon the entire flock had crossed the stream, and up the hill on the opposite side we saw the shepherd climbing, closely followed by his flock, calling as he went.

So, the Good Shepherd, when difficult and dangerous places on life's pathway must be crossed, goes before his people, and if they will keep close to Him they are safe, forever safe.

Another shepherd had fed his flock in the same pastures until he felt that, for the well-being of the sheep in his care, a change was necessary. Across a stream, on the opposite hills, there was a rich and abundant pasturage. Looking over the well-cropped fields the shepherd resolved to lead his flock to the green pastures on the other side. Going before, he called his sheep, and they followed him to the stream, but could not be induced to go beyond, encourage them as he would. At length he gathered one of the lambs into his bosom, and began to cross the stream. The distracted mother followed the shepherd to the edge of the stream, hesitated a moment, and then stepped down into the water, keeping close to the shepherd, encouraged by his voice, and drawn by the bleating of the lamb he carried tenderly in his arms. The other sheep followed, and soon the entire flock had crossed in safety.

Does not our loving Heavenly Father sometimes call his children, and call in vain, from pastures where their souls are growing lean, to pastures, which, in love and mercy, he has provided for them, and when they still refuse to listen to his voice, he constrains them to follow him, by removing that in which their souls had delighted—cherished possessions, or it may be the nearest and dearest from the home circle. Whatever he does is done in love and to draw us nearer to Him and away from the lean pastures where our souls cannot be nourished.

Questions and Answers

H. H. S., Detroit, Mich. Who was the Melchizedek mentioned in Gen. 14, to whom Abraham paid tithes?

He is called King of Salem, which, as we learn from the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, was the ancient name of Jerusalem. Among the same tablets are several letters from Ebed-tob, the king of Salem, to the then reigning Pharaoh, asking for help against his enemies. In them are expressions curiously resembling those of Melchizedek. He tells the Pharaoh, for instance, that he was not like other governors, inasmuch as he had not received his crown by inheritance from his father or mother, but it had been conferred upon him by the mighty king. The expression, the mighty king, may refer to the king of the Hittites, but it is more probable that he meant the mighty God. The writer of Hebrews refers to this king as being a Royal Priest, of whom little was known, king of righteousness and king of peace. Christ, he says, was a priest of that kind. The passage is allegorical, tending to show that in believing the tradition of Melchizedek, the Jew showed that he recognized a priesthood before Aaron. Christ was a priest of that kind and he continues ever.

Inquirer, Meriden, Conn. Are the X-rays dangerous to life or health?

Probably not in proper hands, but they are apparently very dangerous when handled by unscientific or careless persons. Mr. Edison's assistant, Dalley, died lately of X-ray injuries, and Mr. Edison himself is said to be a severe sufferer from internal pains, knotted muscles and sinews, and sleeplessness, which he attributes to the cathode ray.

Rev. H. Loomis, agent of the American Bible Society at Yokohama, Japan, writes, to make an appeal for means to support the work of distributing the Gospel among the sick and wounded Japanese soldiers. He says there are now 45,000 sick and wounded in the hospitals, 13,000 at Tokio alone. He is distributing thousands of Testaments and Scripture portions among them, but there is no limit to the work, and help would be most welcome.

J. M. S., Asheville, N. C. 1. Who is the King, and who is the Man mentioned in Isaiah 32:1, 2? 2. Who are the princes mentioned?

1. The chapter is descriptive of the blessings of the expected Messianic reign, and the King referred to is the Messiah. "A man shall be as an hiding-place," leading commentators hold, would be more accurately translated "the man" or "one eminent as a man," i. e., the "Son of Man." 2. The princes who "shall rule in judgment" refer to all in authority under Christ in the coming Messianic Kingdom. The Jewish Targum translates "princes" as "the righteous."

W. J. G., Chase, Kan. 1. Why does the Dowager Queen of China reign instead of the Emperor? 2. Why did not Emperor William, the son of the eldest child of Queen Victoria, succeed to the English throne on the death of his grandmother?

1. The Emperor of China is the nominal head of the government. The Dowager governs in his name, and having gained power during his minority, keeps him in subjection. If he chose to assert himself and could win the support of a powerful party, he could depose her from a station she has no right to occupy, now that he is of age. 2. The rule in European countries is for the eldest son to succeed. If he dies without issue the next eldest son and so on until heirs male are exhausted. If the recently born son of the Emperor of Russia survives he will succeed his father, although his sisters are older than he. If the Duke of Kent had left a son he would have succeeded to the English throne, instead of Queen Victoria, though he might have been younger than Victoria.

Geo. S., Toronto, Can. What is the explanation of the picture known as Raphael's Sistine Madonna?

It explains itself. It is one of the two greatest pictures of Raffaello Sanzio, the great Italian painter. He painted the Virgin and the Infant Jesus as no other painter had ever done. The Madonna della Sedia, which hangs in the famous Pitti Palace at Florence, gives a Roman view of the Holy Family—a happy mother bending over a lovely child, her face expressing affection and serene contentment. The Madonna di San Sisto is held by critics to be so beautiful as to be beyond the power of description, the sweet grace and loveliness of the mother, and the solemn, thoughtful, yet childlike expression, of the Infant Saviour, delighting all beholders.

D. D. L., Montrose, Pa. I note the remarks in THE MAIL BAG about the rainbow, a token of a covenant. It appears to me unnecessary for the Lord to change a natural law, in order that the rainbow may be a token of the covenant. I understand from the wording of the text, that the rainbow appeared in the cloud before the flood, precisely as it did afterwards; but God calls earth's attention to the bow as a reminder of the covenant. It was the most suitable object for that purpose, as it appears when the sky is threatening a storm, reminding the people of the flood; but seeing the bow, they are again reminded of the covenant. The fourteenth verse shows that God would continue to set his bow in the cloud, and does not necessarily change the natural import of the thirteenth verse.

"One Who Wants to Know His Will." Should a Christian girl keep company with a man who is not a Christian? Shall I tell him the reason why or shall I say "No," and say nothing of the other matter?

It would be a very doubtful, and, in our opinion, an unwise experiment, to encourage the addresses of one who has nothing in common with your own faith, and even more dangerous if the person is an avowed unbeliever. See II Cor., 6:14. If, in the course of acquaintance, you were made the means of leading him to the light, it would be quite another matter; but unless you had substantial reason for believing in a genuine change, your union to such a one would be at the peril of your own spiritual and material future.

G. J. H. E., Freedom, N. H. What is the meaning of Luke 16:9? What is the "mammon of unrighteousness," and also what is the "everlasting habitations?"

The better reading is "make to yourselves friends out of (or by the help of) the mammon of unrighteousness." It means to turn to your own highest advantage those riches which others shamefully abuse. The "everlasting habitations" are mentioned in contrast with the temporary shelter which the steward in the parable received from those creditors he had befriended.

Mrs. K. S., Los Angeles, Calif. A lady teaching a Sunday School class of young girls, suddenly gave it up. The girls were scattered to other classes, two being together in a new class. They have no fault to find with their new teacher, but they love their first teacher. Is it wrong to pray that they may again have teacher No. 1?

They may do so, but the wiser way would be to content themselves with the new order of things. It does not seem quite fair to the new teacher for her class to begin with a prejudice against her.

Miss H. A., Altoona, Ia. Why is the word seven used in the Bible so many times, and what does it signify more than any other figure?

Seven was considered by the ancients as the "holy" or "perfect" number. There are seven days in Creation, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven days in the week, seven graces, "seven ages" in the life of man, seven phases of the moon, the seventh Sabbatical year, the seven times seven jubilee year, the great feasts lasted seven days, purifications lasted seven days, there were seven trumpets, seven churches in Asia, etc. In Scripture seven is the representative symbolic number, and was so regarded by Hebrews, Persians, Indians, Greeks and Romans. It was the coefficient for the appointment of all sacred periods, and was besides the symbol of completeness.

E. A. Wheaton, Minn. I was converted some years ago, but I see no evidence of my being a Christian. I have no comfort, and I doubt my own standing. I cannot understand myself. What must I do?

We do not know your special difficulty, but think that you are looking within too much. Your help must come from above.

You know you are a sinner. Your letter indicates that you are quite convinced of it. You know that it was sinners that Christ came to save. Why not put yourself in his hands and trust him to save you? I will do it if you wish. Do not expect a sudden change such as takes place in some people. God's methods are not always the same. But, having given yourself into Christ's hands, continue trusting him, and let him work his own will in you. Think much of him, and cease watching yourself. Try to submit yourself entirely to him, believing that he is able and willing to save you. Ask him honestly and sincerely to save you, and you may be sure he will do it. It is not your feelings that will save you, but his own power.

Mr. J. Calumet, Mich. What income, or revenue, does the present Czar of Russia receive? The Czar has no fixed salary, but his annual income is estimated at $12,000,000. Besides receiving such share of the general revenue as the Crown may need, the Czar has private estates of more than one million square miles of cultivated land and forests, and gold and other mines in Siberia. The same authority places the Emperor of Austria's income at $3,750,000, King of Bavaria $1,412,000, King of Greece $200,000, King of Italy $2,858,000, King of Spain $1,400,000, and $500,000 for dependents. There is, of course, no official authority for the estimates quoted.

Mr. R. I find myself unable to enjoy the reading of the Bible. Is there any way by which I can get the pleasure out of it that other people find? A good way, which has helped many, is to make a single short book like the Epistle to the Ephesians and read it through at a sitting, trying to get its real meaning. The Bible does not have a fair chance when it is read in fragments of a single chapter here and there. If you are earnestly seeking to lead a godly life you will find in any of the books of the New Testament help that will make the book precious to you. The Gospels especially will become profoundly interesting, if you study them to get a clear idea of what kind of life it was that Christ lived.

H. C. G., London, Ont. What were the sins of the Jews that led to the Babylonish captivity? The sins mentioned cover the whole category of evil doing. They were neglect of the Sabbath, the worship of idols, the disregard of God's ordinances, and the corruption of the rulers. If you read the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah you will find the indictment. A summary is given in a few words in II Chron., 36: 14-17.

R. P. L., San Francisco. Who were the Nicolaitanes mentioned in Rev. 2:15?

It is not positively known, but from the context it would appear that they were people who abused Paul's doctrine of Christian liberty, which they turned into license. It is supposed that Jude 4 refers to them. They appear to have attended the heathen rites and shared in the abominations there practised. Some suppose them to have been followers of Nicolas of Antioch, but if so, they falsely claimed that he taught such things. It is more probable that the name, if relating to a person at all, has been confused with some other Nicolas.

UNTIL January 31st next (1905) we shall break the sets of our new Library of the World's Famous Books and sell you any volume or volumes you choose. There are 20 volumes in the set. Which 10 volumes out of the 20 will prove to be the most popular?

Everyone who predicts before December 15th which ten books we shall sell before midnight of January 31st in larger numbers than any of the other ten—in other words, who names the ten most popular ones—will receive $150. in cash. It is not necessary to name the ten in the order in which they sell, simply name the ten that sell more than any of the other ten.

Everyone who predicts correctly after December 15th and before January 1st, will receive $100. in cash.

The date that governs the amount of these prizes will be the date you mail your predictions, as shown by the postmark on the envelope.

We believe we shall secure more friends and more publicity for the Library in this way than by spending one hundred thousand dollars in magazine and newspaper advertising.

We plan to add to this Library from time to time, and expect to do a larger annual business with it than has ever been done with any one set of books. So much to explain why we can afford to pay these large prizes, although we do not hope to make any profit on the present sale.

20. Last Days of Pompeii

These twenty volumes represent a wide range of taste, but each one is unquestionably among the leaders of its class. Anyone who is familiar with these twenty books will never lack a subject of conversation in any company. This prize offer will secure many new readers for these standard works, which should be in every home where the English language is read and spoken. Hon. William T. Harris, U. S. Commissioner of Education, writes:

DEAR MR. MERRILL:—I am glad you are going to introduce a library of such good books into each family of our land.

These books which furnish keys to our experience and which explain to us great historical epochs and the growth of important national ideas—the birth of new convictions which by and by cause revolutions, political, industrial and educational. You have books in your selection that are eminent examples of several types. You will deserve well of your country if you can persuade the people to buy and read such books. Yours truly, WILLIAM T. HARRIS.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale, writes:

"I am much interested in your plan. The only wonder is that it has not been carried out before. Your list seems to me a very good one, and while, of course, I think I could improve it perhaps, I am sure that if you can circulate these books as you propose, it will be a great advantage to us all." Truly yours, EDWARD E. HALE.

The Washington Post, of Washington, D. C., one of the best newspapers in the United States, will decide who are the successful contestants and to what prize each one is entitled.

How the Prizes Will Be Awarded

The entire reputation of our concern, with more than a million dollars capital and eleven years of successful book publishing, is pledged to the fair and square awarding and payment of these prizes. As to our responsibility, look up Merrill & Baker, New York, in Dun or Bradstreet. No one in any way connected with our establishment or with The Washington Post, will be allowed to compete. Each prediction will be numbered, dated and registered in a manner that will prevent mistake or fraud. The correctness of the awarding of the prizes will be certified to by Gunn, Richards & Co., the well-known firm of expert accountants and business engineers of 43 Wall Street, New York. And a statement of the result will be published in the leading newspapers. For convenience of the Judge of the contest, and to prevent any possible confusion with the rest of our business, this contest will be conducted entirely from Washington, D. C. Address all inquiries and predictions to Dept. K., World's Famous Books Contest, care The Washington Post, Washington, D. C.

Use Your Own Brains and Consult Your Friends

Look over the list carefully and make up your mind which ten volumes you would choose for yourself if you could have ten of the twenty, and only ten. If you have average taste in books you won't be far out of the way in naming the ten. Many learned and bookish people, among them Sir John Lubbock, have published lists of what they considered the world's best hundred books, and some of the magazines have published articles regarding the world's best books. Look up and see how the twenty mentioned here are rated in such lists. Consult your local book dealer, and find out which ten he thinks will sell the best—which he has sold the most of. Consult the Librarian of any library to which you have access. Ask public and high school teachers and professors which ten are the best. Then make your prediction. The more intelligence you put into making your predictions the greater your prospect of success. But do this quickly—at once—you must determine quickly to secure one of the larger prizes.

Who May Predict. Limit as to Time and Number

The price of each volume is $1.00. Each book is good, honest value for the dollar. For each volume you buy you are entitled to make one prediction—that is, name the ten volumes which you think will prove most popular—will sell better than the other ten. You may buy any number of volumes up to twenty and make as many different predictions as you buy books. But no person will be allowed to make more than twenty predictions.

Your Money Back if You Wish

Any time within one week after you receive your books (one or more) you may return any or all of them and we will return your money—$1 for each book delivered to us in as good condition as you received it. We wouldn't make this offer if the books were not all right, would we? This return privilege applies to books bought by mail before January 15th. Books ordered after January 15th will not be returnable because any withdrawals after that would complicate awarding the prizes.

Those Who Answer Before December 15th Win Most, Skill Being Equal

Even the smallest prize ($100) is worth having for nothing—and it really costs you nothing, because for every dollar you invest you receive full value in books. Each volume is carefully printed from good, readable type on unusually expensive and handsome laid paper, very white, with ample margins. There are appropriate full page illustrations, an average of 67 to the volume. The books are considerably larger than the popular novel size and are bound in ribbed silk vellum, handsome and durable, with gilt tops and an ornamental back design stamped in gold. They will be a credit to your library shelves. Each book is full value for a dollar, and we guarantee that this price will never be reduced or cut. Not a volume of this edition will ever be sold for less than One Dollar. The entire object of this plan would be defeated if you were not pleased with the books you buy. We cannot hope to make any profit out of this initial sale. Our profits must come out of future sales in completing the set of which you buy a volume or more now, and in selling sets to your neighbors or friends who will learn of our library by seeing your books. Thus, as you must see, our success depends on your complete satisfaction with every book you buy.

An Ideal Christmas Gift

Can you conceive of a more appropriate Christmas gift than these books? They are ever welcome companions of the old and the young. You can give away the book and keep for yourself this most unusual opportunity to secure one of the prizes.

These four stores will sell these books during the contest. Your right to predict will be the same whether you buy by mail from Washington, or at any of these stores. At the stores you can examine the books before buying. These store sales will be counted, of course, in the totals. You may be sure these stores would not do this unless they were confident that we would do exactly as we promise.

If you cannot visit one of these stores, send $1.00 for each book you want to Dept. K., THE WORLD'S FAMOUS BOOK CONTEST, Washington Post, Washington, D. C., and the books will be sent you and blanks on which to make your predictions. If you want further particulars before ordering, address Dept. K., WORLD'S FAMOUS BOOK CONTEST, Washington Post, Washington, D. C.

A PERSONAL NOTE FROM DR. KLOPSCH

I APPEAL TO ALL MY CHRISTIAN HERALD FRIENDS to come to my assistance at this, the busiest and most trying season of the year.

Orders by the thousands will soon pour in daily from every side, and I always endeavor to make the prompt filling of every order a matter of personal interest.

How much this adds to the cares of an exceptionally busy man only they can know who have personally experienced such a phenomenal rush at a time when every moment seemed already mortgaged by other matters of apparently equal urgency.

A family of nearly 250,000 members has many wants, and to gratify and satisfy these wants in an entirely acceptable manner is one of the calls that must be recognized and properly responded to.

To do this is, at best, no easy task, but especially difficult when inexperienced help must necessarily be employed to assist.

If our friends would help us by anticipating their renewals and premium orders by just a few weeks—or even a few days—they would enable us to do the work much more accurately and expeditiously and at the same time relieve me personally of much of the strain.

There are instances when this may be inconvenient or impracticable, and then we would not ask you to share the burden; but, if altogether convenient, please co-operate with me to the extent of sending your renewal as early as possible, and be assured in advance of my sincerest gratitude for any relief you may thus afford me in the direction mentioned above.

THROW AWAY THE BOX OF POWDER

Do not clog up the poor baby's skin with a substance which may seem to temporarily relieve, but which—any way you look at it—is grit and cannot be dissolved. It will stay where you put it, only to clog and irritate before long. The finer powder you use, the more it gets into the pores.

You will never use powder again if you bathe the baby with and gently apply just a touch of SPIM Ointment, which is absorbed; soothes instantly; cannot injure. It's as good for you as for your baby. Eczema and all skin irritations yield to its wonderful curative properties at once. If your skin is troubled in any way, one trial will suffice to prove its power to heal. Use it sparingly—a little goes a long way and works wonders.

For a "School of Peace"

BY EDWIN GINN, BOSTON, MASS.

FROM year to year, the peoples of the civilized nations meet in convention to discuss the problems of peace and war. Our peace congresses are exerting a deep influence. Yet the misfortunes of war are pressing upon us more heavily year by year. It would be difficult for any one to picture war in all its phases in stronger language than that used by Sumner in his True Grandeur of Nations, or by Channing in his Discourses on War, or by Bloch in his economic treatment of the subject. It is not a lack of the knowledge of the horrors of war and the blessings of peace that retards our movement; it is the failure of the people to grapple with the subject in a businesslike way.

There now exists among the civilized nations the most complete military organization the world has ever known, a force almost beyond our ability to comprehend. Eight millions of the ablest-bodied men in the world are withdrawn largely from productive service, and their future, as regards salary and promotion, depends upon the present military regime. In addition to this maintenance of vast armies and navies, there is the enormous expense of establishing and equipping fortifications. All this imposes a frightful burden upon the community. To support this force and carry this burden, the industrial world is hard at work, on the farm, in the shop, on the sea, in the counting-house, in all the vocations for the real uplifting of humanity; and after paying the enormous taxes imposed upon them because of these great armaments, there is left to many a pitiful margin for the absolute necessities of life. Mr. Atkinson has computed from government sources that in this country each family of five people pays for the expense of warfare $200 a year—a terrible burden, when we consider that not one family in ten is able to put by, year by year, one-half this amount.

We need a body of educators, whose sole duty should be to go among teachers, awakening and developing an intelligent and adequate interest in this great subject. This work of education should commence with the school children; it is with them that our greatest hope lies. Tell them of the heroes in every-day life, who are sacrificing their lives in the investigation of the germs of disease and the methods of destroying them; in draining malarial swamps; in saving the shipwrecked; in missionary work among the heathen and in our own land; of brave firemen who, at the risk of their lives, are saving the lives and property of others; of men and women working in the slums of our great cities, and picturing the misery they find there in order to awaken public interest and the public conscience; of the trained and tireless nurses, watching by sick beds night and day; of teachers in overcrowded schoolrooms, whose burden of responsibility and care knows almost no limit. Surely no man upon the battle-field deserves higher encomiums than these unselfish workers.

Again, the clergy need to be awakened in much fuller measure to their duties and responsibilities for existing conditions. Some of the ablest representatives of the pulpit should be enabled to devote their lives to going among their brother ministers and corresponding with them, arousing enthusiasm, devotion, and exertion in this great cause. Every Christian minister in the land should be made to feel that if he is not rendering service in this field, he is not doing his duty.

If one-half of the amount now spent for purposes of war were devoted to the upbuilding of society, it would establish a thorough system of graded highways; it would connect all the great river-systems for purposes of commerce, it would irrigate and make fruitful the immense tracts of sandy deserts throughout the length and breadth of the civilized world; it would eliminate the congested sections in our great cities, and in the place of crowded tenement houses, unfit for human beings to live in, provide comfortable homes at moderate cost; it would make possible a careful supervision of all the great mining industries, reducing the fearful loss of life to a minimum; it would build hundreds of floating hospitals for the sick during the summer months; it would found permanent hospitals wherever needed; it would establish a thousand farms and workshops near the great centres of population, where the unfortunates could help themselves; it would establish a paid commission in every country which should give its entire time to the study of the different problems connected with the various industries of the day, and aid in the solution of these most perplexing questions; it would provide schools in every neglected portion of the globe.

Constant agitation will be imperative for many years to come to educate the people to demand a less expensive and more reasonable method of conducting international relations. No solution of this most difficult problem is possible unless it be undertaken by broad-minded men who are seeking only the highest good for all. If we can ever bring the nations to limit this constantly increasing military force, there will be much more hope for the future; with this terrible burden removed, we can move forward more efficiently and more hopefully.

I wish—and this is really the central thing in my mind—to throw out a hint for the consideration of business men, in regard to the foundation of an organization which might properly be called "A School of Peace." In the first place, in establishing such a school, a board of trustees should be selected from those who have shown distinct originality and executive ability in carrying on large business enterprises. To their hands should be committed the duty of choosing the ablest men in the country who desire to devote their lives to the study of this most important of all questions. They should carefully consider the conditions of the whole world and the relation of all nations to each other, in order to inaugurate a working scheme that shall be just to all. They should be competent to select the most efficient assistants to join with them in the great undertaking. To establish and equip this "School of Peace" on broad and lasting foundations, a large endowment is necessary. Moral influence is good, but if that is our sole reliance, this cause will not be far advanced.

The whole world has so long depended upon physical force to maintain proper relations among the nations, that a change to an economical, moral and reasonable plan for the settlement of differences must perhaps be slow. We may not expect to perfect the ideal organization in a day or in a year. The great object should be to make a real beginning toward lessening the armaments of the nations. This work cannot be done by one or two men; but we can lay the cornerstone. All great enterprises must have a beginning; and it is in the providence of the All-Wise that no good thought or act shall fail. Some seed may fall in barren places by the wayside; but enough will find fruitful soil and grow, until the earth shall yield its rich harvest of good overcoming evil, when man shall no longer desire to overreach or injure his brother, but all shall join in the prayer and effort for peace on earth and good will to men.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Famous University

A History of Columbia University appears opportunely, just before the 150th anniversary of its foundation. The successive changes in the name of this now venerable institution of learning are an epitome of its history. First (1754), King's College; then (1784), Columbia College, and, finally (1896), Columbia University, which includes Columbia College, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Barnard College (for women), Teachers College, College of Pharmacy, and Schools of Law, Mines, Chemistry, Engineering and Architecture. A great expansion has taken place within the last fifty years. In 1854, there were but 172 students in attendance; in 1904 no less than 4,709. The library has grown from 15,000 volumes in 1864, to 362,000 in 1904. Undoubtedly these figures suggest an increasing liberality in the policy of the University during the period to which they apply. Fifty years ago—or forty years, for that matter—the authorities of Columbia College showed little desire to enlarge its usefulness by extending its advantages to a larger number of students. A great change came with the administration of the late President Barnard (1864-1889), who, as an educator, looked much further into the future than most men of his day. He, it was, who furnished the impulse, which ultimately transformed the College into a University, embracing all subjects of knowledge, and open to women as well as to men. His must remain one of the greatest names in the history of Columbia. The History, etc., covers 462 pages, and even this gives but an outline of the past and present activities of the institution. Obviously a few paragraphs are inadequate for the most general view of the subject. It may be said safely, that no university in the United States or elsewhere is more progressive in its methods, or advanced in its general policy than Columbia, and that no professional schools have a higher reputation than its Schools of Medicine, Law, Mines and Chemistry.

To enumerate all the great names which have adorned the history of Columbia would be a serious task. Among the famous older graduates were Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, Gouverneur Morris, Robert E. Livingston, DeWitt Clinton, and Hamilton Fish. On the roll of law professors we find the illustrious names of James Kent and Theodore W. Dwight. The Medical School has had such men as John C. Dalton, Valentine Mott, Willard Parker, Alonzo Clark, Edward Delafield, etc. The general faculty boasts the names of Charles Anthon, Henry Drisler, Francis Lieber, Charles Davies, Charles F. Chandler, etc.

At the present time the University has the services of a faculty, whose combined talents and scholarship defy description within the limits of this brief review. Whatever can contribute to thorough education, whether general or professional, is to be found at Columbia, thanks to the liberality of the alumni and the citizens of New York and to the enlightened policy of the trustees. For particulars, the reader must consult the neat, comprehensive, well printed and well illustrated volume (issued by the Columbia University Press, New York, and published by Macmillan & Co., London and New York), in which the history of the University is presented.

A Harvest of Souls

DURING the past summer, services have been held in Brooklyn, N. Y., in a tent on the circus grounds, near Broadway and Halsey Street. Three times on Sundays and every evening except Saturday, large numbers have attended and have listened attentively to the preaching of the earnest evangelists who have had charge of the meetings. Many souls have been won and have given evidence that the change in their lives is real and permanent. Several churches in the neighborhood have received accessions of membership through God's blessing on the effort. At the Bushwick Avenue Congregational Church, the pastor, Dr. Charles T. Baylis, had the pleasure, on October 2, of receiving forty-three new members, thirty-four of whom were accepted on profession of faith and nine by letter from other churches. Dr. Baylis has taken a prominent part in the tent services, and in receiving the new members expressed his sincere thankfulness for the harvest which has been gathered from the summer's sowing on this somewhat unpromising field.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

"Out here on the Texas plains where the finest beef to be found in America is raised, we select and pack the choicest beef, from which to make None Such Mince Meat," said Miss Nonesuch to Mrs. Briggs.

"Every package is inspected by the United States Government and bears a certificate to that effect, thus proving its perfect condition."

"In the None Such Factories it is prepared by machinery, thoroughly cleansed and sterilized, and then passes through the wonderfully ingenious mechanical devices which mix it with the raisins, spices, currants, apples and sugar that make the cleanest, purest and most delicious mince meat that was ever put together—None Such—the only mince meat that makes the pies 'like mother used to make.'"

"Why do so many people work and worry for days making mince meat when they can buy enough None Such to make two big pies for only ten cents?" asked Mrs. Briggs.

"They don't all worry—somebody used 12,000,000 packages of None Such Mince Meat last year, and it went from Maine to California," answered Miss Nonesuch.

"Now we must be off to Louisiana where the sugar comes from."

WING & SON,

36th YEAR—ESTABLISHED 1868

"Jacob," said the minister, cordially extending his hand, "I have heard all about your wife's interest in the little girl in India."

"An', an', my interest," jealously stammered Jake, looking shamefaced.

"Of course, of course," returned the minister, feeling at the same time no small amount of surprise. "It is a wonderful privilege, my friend," he continued, "the child, no doubt, shall grow up to be a great blessing to her own race. Eternity alone shall be able to reveal the good you may be doing."

As soon as he had parted from the minister, Jake hurried around to the village general store.

When a collar had been selected, and put on, Jake walked out of the store holding his head very high, and feeling his neck very stiff.

"Ef I could meet the minister now," he soliloquised, "I'd be a credit to my country, an'—an' to—Janey."

An electrical storm had been threatening all afternoon, and before Jake reached home it came upon him. The lightning was very sharp, and the rain poured. Jake sought shelter in a small belt of woods, drew a large bandanna handkerchief out of his pocket and carefully tied it over his paper collar. While he was waiting there, the lightning struck a tall pine tree not many yards from where he was standing. He looked on the death-smitten tree, and instantly he remembered reading that terrible storms at times prevailed in India. A great fear suddenly possessed him that the little Janey might possibly be caught in one of those storms.

"O God, take keer o' the little Janey out in Ing'y!" It seemed somehow to give him a grain of comfort, when he could not have a hand himself in shielding her from danger, to appeal to One whom he was taught in his childhood had a hand in managing the whole universe.

When he reached home he felt reluctant to take off the paper collar, while at the same time he felt half ashamed to leave it on before Jane. Although it was very stiff, and chafed his neck sorely as he stooped and reached while feeding the stock and doing the night chores, somehow it made him think himself of more importance.

When Jake had his work done, and had come in from the barn, he found that Jane, in clearing up the house had somehow mislaid his paper, which he had just brought home from the post-office—at least when he could not find it he blamed her for mislaying it. He was beginning to show much impatience and talk very cross, when suddenly it occurred to him, "Janey'd hate to hear me speak so to her ma." The thought suddenly calmed him, and a few seconds later he found the newspaper behind the large eight-day clock, where he had shoved it himself. He sat down by a lighted tallow dip and began to read aloud the news to her while she sewed buttons on his vest. Among the local items he stumbled upon the following:

"Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Bender, of the Ninth Concession, have undertaken the support of a child, said to be a very handsome and promising little girl, in a mission school in India. The Editor wishes them every success in their novel and praiseworthy undertaking."

Jake was beside himself with delight. "Did you ever hear the likes o' that? How did they ever hear about it? Ef that don't beat cucumbers!" he said to Jane, waiting for no replies. "Did you notice they said handsome an' promising? that's right! Of course she's handsome an' promising or we wouldn't hev anythin' to do with her! Cut out this little piece, Jane, and paste it in beside our weddin' notice."

There was a short silence, then Jake said, hesitatingly, eying a hole in the stovepipe which ran along the ceiling of the room: "Would you mind, Jane, ef I wore one o' them b'iled collars every time I went to the village?"

"No," said Jane, arranging a brown horn button on her needle, feeling conscious that she would be proud of having her husband wear a collar.

That night when Jake and Jane were retiring, Jane knelt sedately by their bedside and prayed long and earnestly. Jake seemed to know that she was praying for the little girl in India, and for one moment he felt like throwing himself on his knees beside her.

The next morning Jake saw Jane carrying some heavy pails, and in a sort of shamefaced way he went up and took them out of her hands and carried them himself. Jane, with woman's intuitive power, said in her secret heart: "It's the little gal in Ing'y is makin' him do this."

When, next morning, he was reharnessing his horses for the plough, one of them crowded over against him. Jake was quick-tempered, and his first impulse, which he obeyed, was to hurl a lot of expletives at the offending horse, and start to pound him over the head with his fists. Suddenly something seemed to arrest him. "Janey'd hate to hear those—those big words," he said to himself. Then he mildly asked his poor bewildered horse to stand over, a request which the horse immediately complied with.

"I'll be slivered," said Jake, "ef I won't quit them words, they ain't fit for the father of a promisin' gal. I'll be sliv—I suppose that's one o' them," he gasped, and he never finished the sentence.

Some weeks after this, Jane received another letter, in which it was stated that the little girl in India had the scarlet fever. The writer did not imagine what consternation her words would produce when she said, "The attack threatens to be very severe." Jake and Jane were filled with the gravest forebodings.

If Janey should die he felt as if he could scarcely stand it. Jane's faith kept her from sinking into the depths of despair which seemed to swamp her husband.

He simply could not endure it alone; sometimes he would talk out his fears to Jane, but more often he would go off into some hidden corner and pray over and over again, "O God take keer o' the little gal in Ing'y!" Prayer was fast becoming a habit with Jake, but still he was restless, not having any assurance that Janey would get better.

One day when he and Jane had concluded that the time to expect a letter from India had fully arrived, Jake went into the village. Inquiring in full faith at the post-office, he learned to his dismay that no letter had come. He was now sure that Janey had died, or was dying, and that was the reason Lavinia Millar did not write. He started for home almost overpowered. As soon as he reached there and had told his worst fears to Jane, he went away into the hay-loft; he would have gone to the woods, but the ground by that time was covered with a foot of snow, and falling on his knees on the soft hay up near the rafters, he lifted his hands to heaven and prayed as he had never prayed before. As he prayed a strange peace crept slowly over his stormy heart, and seemed to flood the cobweb-draped hay-loft.

He rose from his knees, and went into the house, wearing an expression of countenance such as Jane had never before seen him wear.

That evening, a neighbor who had been in to the post-office called, and brought them the expected letter from India. It contained the joyful intelligence that Janey had fully recovered.

"I knowed it," said Jake complacently, "afore the letter came." Jane looked at him, and asked no questions.

The twenty-fourth of November had always been in Jake's mind a day of feasting and merry-making, roast turkey and plum-pudding had loomed prominently in the foreground of his conception of that day, but on this twenty-fourth he was up early, brushing the horses and polishing the harness. When he came in to breakfast he said to his wife: "Hurry up, Jane, an' git the dishes washed, we must go in to church to-day." Jane was not surprised; she had been reading Jake's heart better than he knew.

As Jake stood in the quiet village church, the soft winter light falling through the blue glass on his hymn-book, and joined with the congregation in singing one of the old Thanksgiving hymns, he knew, and Jane knew, that he was celebrating his first Thanksgiving Day.

"I intend to," was the quiet answer, as he made preparations to go out the second time. "Get the lantern ready, Katie, and I'll go and saddle old Dave. I'm dreadfully afraid Dick has attempted the river road."

"I'm real afraid to have you go, pa," said his wife, melting in an instant. "You may get lost yourself."

"Well, you can't lose me!" exclaimed Katie. "Let me go along, pa. I've got rubber boots, you know, and I just love to wade in the snow. I don't care a single minute for drifts. We'll take old Watch along, too, and he'll be a big help. Put a bottle of that ginger-tea in my cloak pocket, mother; I'll make Dick drink every drop of the dregs for this scare, see I don't. And mother! wouldn't it be a good plan so ring the big dinner-bell once in a while, so if we should get rattled we'd know how to steer?"

"That child has good sense as well as luck," said her father, admiringly. "I don't know, mother, but it might be well enough to let her go. She can ride old Dave turn about."

"And I'm going to take the old horn we used to use before we got the bell," said Katie, enthused by her father's commendation. "I'll blow it every little while, mother, to comfort you, and if Dick should be astray, it may guide him to us."

Mrs. Ridgeway shook her head, but said no more, and the strong young girl hurried on her wraps and got the lantern ready. In a few minutes they were off through the blinding storm.

It was hard work keeping right, and progress was necessarily slow, but they were well acquainted with the country, and Watch could not be easily puzzled as to his whereabouts. At intervals, Katie blew on the old tin horn, a long, winding blast, and was answered by a sharp peal of the great dinner-bell, that could be heard for half a mile at least.

Just before they reached the road that branched off and wound along the bank of the river, they heard a team approaching slowly. Their hearts leaped with a great thankfulness, and, involuntarily, the words "Thank God!" burst from Mr. Ridgeway's lips. But the next moment a gruff voice issuing a command to the foundering horses, told them that Dick and Dorothy were not the occupants of the vehicle, but neighbor Wilkins, who lived on the farm just beyond them. He had been to the village of Buddtown and was just returning. Mr. Ridgeway stopped him and asked if he had seen anything of their missing guests. The answer made his heart sink. "No, I haven't seen anybody since I left Buddtown; not a livin' soul."

"Then," said Mr. Ridgeway, turning his horse towards the river, "they have either not left home at all, or they have taken this road. Blow the horn, Katie, and I'll call out as we go along. Be careful how you step, child. Stay, you get in old Dave and father'll walk."

For as much as an hour they plodded carefully on, flashing their lantern here and there, hoping yet dreading to find the objects of their search. Every minute the road became more dangerous, the way wilder and the storm more furious. At last, Watch bounded forward with a loud, prolonged howl, which broke almost instantly into wild barking. Hastening on, they found him standing on the edge of the embankment and acting as if he were going to leap over. In a moment he did so, his great feet sending up a shower of snow as he plunged downward. Mr. Ridgeway called loudly, and Katie again blew her horn. A feeble voice answered him; Dick's voice, faint and tremulous from pain. "Is that you, father! Oh, thank the Lord. I was sure he would send you to look after us."

"Are you all alive?" shouted the father. "Dorothy—the child?"

"Yes, we're alive all right," was the answer, "but hurt some. Dorothy fainted, but she's coming to, and the baby is all right. If you can give us a little help, I guess we can climb up."

"I'm coming straight down to get that baby," said Katie, descending in front of her father, who was carrying the lantern. Fortunately the embankment was not very steep, and it was but a few minutes ere they reached Dorothy, who was clinging desperately to the tree against which she had fallen. The baby had been flung into a soft drift, and being but a bundle of thick shawls was unhurt. Dick had been dragged quite a little distance, and had sprained his arm badly and cut his head against a projecting rock.

"It is God's mercy you are not all dead!" exclaimed Mr. Ridgeway, in a husky tone, as they helped the travelers up the ascent with considerable difficulty, for Dorothy was hurt so badly that she could not step without almost fainting with pain. "How did it happen?"

"The horses got frightened at something," said Dick, "and pitched us over without a minute's warning. Dorothy fell into that tree, but I was dragged nearly to the foot of the embankment. As to the horses, they just rolled over each other and fell into the river. They must both be done for. I don't know where the buggy went to."

"If Dorothy and the child can rest here a bit with Katie and old Watch, we'll go back and see," said Mr. Ridgeway, whose heart was very tender for animals. "I hate to leave the poor critters to suffer. Katie, where is that bottle? Give Dick and Dorothy a pull of it; it'll warm them up. Now, come on, if you can, Dick; it won't take but a few minutes."

Dick, suffering greatly, followed the old man, and together they descended the steep. They found one of the horses dead and the other still struggling in the river. They made an effort to reach him, but even as they did so, he ceased to struggle and sank heavily in the water. The buggy they found torn to fragments, and scattered along in different places were their luggage and various articles they had brought with them. But destructive as the event proved, there was nothing but thankfulness in every heart as they wended their way home, Dorothy on old Dave, Dick walking by her side, Mr. Ridgeway leading the horse, and Katie carrying the baby, which she would yield to no one. All felt what a blessing it was that not only were their lives spared, but they had not perished with cold, and that no bones were broken.

The next day Dorothy lay on the couch like a faded flower, and Dick crept about with his head bandaged and his arm in a sling. The great Thanksgiving feast was spread and they bolstered Dorothy up in the big rocker to help eat it; and as Mr. Ridgeway bowed his head and with broken voice gave thanks, every heart fairly ached with its burden of gratitude.

"Father of love," said he, "we thank thee for this Thanksgiving Day. In thy tender mercy thou hast spared our lives and brought us together again out of great peril. We want to do nothing but praise thee and love thee to the end of our days."

When Dick said "Amen" in that strong, earnest voice of his, the tears raced down every face. Then Mrs. Ridgeway smiled through her tears and said huskily: "One thing is sure: We never had such a thankful Thanksgiving in our lives. Now, let's eat, for the Lord giveth us richly all things to enjoy. Get to work and carve the turkey, pa. Dorothy'll feel a heap better when she gets something good to eat."

TO BANISH OPIUM FROM CHINA

ON Nov. 10, at eleven o'clock, Secretary Hay gave a public hearing to the International Reform Bureau, and to representatives of all the Protestant Evangelical Missionary Societies of the United States, the W. C. T. U. and the Presbyterian Temperance Committee, all of which have petitioned him, in view of the anticipated reopening of international Chinese questions at the close of the present war, to use his diplomatic influence to induce Great Britain to withdraw the treaty provisions by which China has been compelled, since 1858, to legalize the opium traffic.

The hearing was opened by Hon. Chas. Lyman, President of the Reform Bureau, who submitted the Bureau's appeal for this action "in the name of conscience and commerce." Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, reviewed the historic precedents and facts bearing on the case.

These points were amplified by four missionaries from China, viz., Rev. Frank D. Gamewell, Mrs. S. L. Baldwin, Dr. William Ashmore, and Rev. W. L. Beard. Secretary Hay, in his reply, quoted from the Declaration of Independence—"a decent respect for the opinion of mankind"—as expressing the power of international public opinion that would be a great factor in achieving the purpose of the hearing. Numerous petitions and resolutions are coming to Secretary Hay by way of seconding this great proposal.

A Pioneer Sunday School

MRS. T. M. SCHELL, of Rogers, N. D., writes: "Last spring we took a claim at Hofflund, Williams Co., N. D., and while we were there had a Sunday School organized with the aid of our pastor, Rev. R. Polege. The school is on Beaver Creek, outh of Ray, in the Missouri flats. There are quite a few settlers there, who moved eight or ten years ago with their families, and have lived as ranchers. They have had a few acres under cultivation. They have had no Sunday School before this one, and the children and their parents are delighted with the school. They are keeping up a good interest in it, and have an organ and can sing nicely. There are no schools, and the children come as far as five miles to attend. This is a Methodist Sunday School. Rev. R. Polege preached in this schoolhouse year before they had the Sunday School, this is one instance where the church is ahead of the Sunday School. They are self-supporting since the first quarter's supplies were furnished, so we feel that God's cause in this place will prosper.

Answered Prayers

Thankful Mother. "I desire to praise God for the conversion of a dear daughter, and for many other blessings received."
P., New York. "I prayed for the recovery of a very dear one and my prayer is surely being answered. I praise my heavenly Father for it."
Reader, Illinois. "I wish to publicly acknowledge that God has heard and answered my prayer. The answer often comes while we are speaking. Read Daniel 9: 20, 21."
I.K., Iowa. "I, too, read with interest the 'Answered Prayers,' and have often taken new courage to go to God and ask in faith, believing, and now he does answer in his own time and way."
Reader, Pennsylvania. "O that every one might know the comfort of carrying everything to God in prayer, for he will indeed answer us if we but trust and obey. I hope this may help some one to trust him."
Miss R. L., Iowa. "The 'Answered Prayer' column is a great blessing and help to me, and enough it I wish to acknowledge God's loving kindness to me in answering a special prayer. I know that he does hear and answer our prayers. I trust him."
Mrs. B. A., Indiana. "My heart is full of thankness to-night, and I want to add my testimony to our God who does answer prayer. He has answered mine many times, and only recently he heard and answered immediately when I was in great trouble."

Mary H., Alabama. "I promised the dear Father if he would help me that I would gratefully acknowledge his kindness. I go to him with everything, and he never fails to help and comfort me. I could not doubt his loving kindness if I wanted to."

M. A. "I was deep in trouble, but I took it all to God in prayer, claimed his promise, John 14:14; 'If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it.' The answer came, as it has often before when in deep distress. He sustained me and answered, for which I praise his holy name."

Mrs. E. P. M., Ohio. "I read with interest each week the list of answers to prayer. A Christian's faith is strengthened by the many acknowledgments therein. I wish to add my testimony to the fidelity of God, when he promised to hear and answer the petitions offered by his children."

Mrs. Alice J., Virginia. "I wish to add my testimony to the goodness of God in answering prayer. He has delivered me from many troubles, and now while I am praying for the salvation of a dear one, I feel that he will answer me. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits.'"

A Subscriber, Michigan. "Through your columns I wish to fulfil my promise to God by acknowledging his answers to my prayers. I prayed that he would restore two loved ones to health, and he graciously answered me. I know that God will always answer our prayers, if it is for our best."

E. C. P., Massachusetts. "God in his infinite goodness and mercy has heard and answered many times, and has just recently answered me in the hour of great need, when none could deliver me but he alone. Hoping this may comfort some afflicted one to come to him in faith, for he is ever ready to hear."

Reader, Virginia. "I wish, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to say that I know the Lord answers our prayers, if we pray, believing. He has answered my prayers in times of trouble. I committed a sin and repented of it, and I prayed with my whole heart to God to send me a sign of forgiveness, believing, almost knowing, that what I asked would come to pass, and in due time it did."

Mrs. M. S. B., Illinois. "I wish to add my testimony to the faithfulness of God in answering prayer, if we come to him in faith. He has directly answered my prayers many times, and I feel that I could not live without the comfort that I may come to him in all times of need. Will the dear praying friends ask the Lord to deliver us from a great trouble that seems to be coming upon us, for with God all things are possible."

E. A. S., Pennsylvania. "I have noticed your 'Answered Prayers,' and I think they are a great comfort to many people. I promised my dear heavenly Father if he would remove a great burden from me I would make public acknowledgment of it, and in his infinite love and mercy he did remove it. Thanks be to his holy name, he always hears the cry of his children, if they will only ask and trust him."

A Reader. "I would like to add my testimony to the many that have already appeared in the 'Answered Prayer' column. My life has indeed been a sad one. So full of grief and sorrow, which at times seemed almost more than I could bear. One great and real cause of my sorrow has been removed, and I believe it was in answer to earnest, fervent prayer. I have received much comfort and help from reading the 'Answered Prayer' column."

Subscriber, North Carolina. "I have been doing what I thought was praying for twenty years, and I never saw any benefit from it, in fact it was more a form than anything else, and I was just on the verge of giving up everything that pertained to religion and go the other way, when, one day, I saw a copy of your paper containing some 'Answered Prayers.' There were just two or three in that number. The way they were put, somehow, struck me in a tender place, and I was made, by reading these prayers, to stop and consider my own condition, and to think why God had never answered my prayer. My conclusion was, that I had never prayed in my life. The great flame that was once in me at my conversion, had died away to but just a feeble spark, and somehow, when I made up my mind to take the back track, I couldn't do it willingly, and so I tried from that day to pray and to lead a different life. I promised God that if he would keep me and answer my prayers, after enabling me to try to pray to him aright, I would publicly acknowledge them. Though it was a small thing, he answered my prayer immediately, bless his precious name, and he has answered lots of times since. Now there is a prayer that I have been asking for years, and he has not answered yet. I want to ask all who may see this in 'Answered Prayers,' to join with me in prayer to God that he may deliver me from this cup, and remove this heavy burden from my heart, which is almost more than I can bear. I have never asked him to remove it more than I have asked him to give me grace to bear it, until it was his holy will to do so."

LONG-DISTANCE BANKING

Pittsburgh Becoming a Great Financial Center.

Pittsburgh is rapidly advancing to the very front rank as a great financial center, and much of this is due to the enterprise of a number of its leading banks, who are stretching out not only all over this continent, but all over the world for business.

The system of Banking by Mail, introduced and perfected by the Pittsburgh Bank for Savings over 10 years ago, is largely responsible for the vast amount of money that comes from nearby and far off points to Pittsburgh, and especially to this strong, old-established bank. As an illustration of the scope of Banking by Mail, we understand that the Pittsburgh Bank for Savings has, during the past two weeks, received four new accounts from the Philippine Islands, one from Galway, Ireland, one from Kaifwa, Kongo Free State, one from Manchester, England, one from Bascasdee, Toro, Panama, and four from Copiapo, Chile, S. A., and then in our own country, Nevada, Florida, Maine and California were represented by new accounts in the above period. These are, of course, outside of the large number of mail accounts received by this bank from Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, West Virginia and other nearby states.

The Pittsburgh Bank for Savings issues a very handsome booklet on the subject of Banking by Mail, which it will be pleased to furnish free of cost to any of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD interested in the safe and profitable investment of their savings and surplus funds.

RUSSIA IN PROPHECY

A NOTABLE prophecy by the Prophet Ezekiel has given considerable trouble to expositors. It describes a crushing judgment which should befall an enemy of Israel. Apparently that disaster which was to cause him to leave five-sixths of his army behind him dead, was to occur in Palestine. He would go forth out of his place with his hordes of many nationalities, against a people dwelling safely, expecting to take a prey. He would say (Ezek. 38: 11) "I will go up to the land of unwallled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates." He was "to come from his place out of the North parts, with many people, all of them riding upon horses, a great company and a mighty army." He was to be overwhelmed with great hailstones, fire and brimstone. God says to him: "I will turn thee back and leave but the sixth part of thee, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord."

Some years ago the author of Armageddon, a famous work on prophecy, identified this enemy of Israel whose name Ezekiel calls Gog, Prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. 39: 1, R. V.), with the Czar of Russia. "The land of Magog," he said, after a long and learned argument, "may be demonstratively regarded in this prophecy, as identical with Russia," the original tribes having settled in the region between the Black and Caspian Seas, and spread northward. Further proof is adduced by Dr. Gill, who states that later Greek writers make mention of a country called Rosh, which they describe as "a Scythian nation, occupying a region between the Black Sea and the north of Taurus, a people fierce and wild." He goes on to show that these people having lived contiguously before they left their first settlements in Asia, preserved their relations of amity throughout their various migrations northward, settled in neighboring countries, and became the progenitors of the Russians or Muscovites.

The identity of Russia being thus established, it is interesting to turn to the prophecy of Ezekiel and read what is to happen to the nation that has made itself famous by its persecution of the Jews. It is true that the prophet sees the disaster occurring in the land of Palestine, so there may be a future crushing calamity yet in store for the Muscovites; but it is singular that the present trouble is almost exactly fulfilling the description of the ancient prophet. Professor Fairbairn has culled from the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel the following passages, which he translates:

Behold I am against thee, Gog, Prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal. And I will make thee to turn back, and put hooks into thy jaws, and lead thee forth and all thy host, horses and horsemen. . . . A great multitude. . . . Persia, Ethiopia, and Phut with them. . . . Gomer and all his hordes; the house of Togarmah, in the extreme north, and all his hordes; many nations with thee. . . . After many days thou gettest the command; at the end of the years thou dost come. . . . upon the mountains of Israel. . . . As a tempest wilt thou come, thou and all thy hordes, and many peoples with thee. . . . to make a booty, and to carry off prey. . . . Sheba and Dedan and the merchants of Tarshish, and all her young lions shall say to thee, "Art thou come to take spoil?" [The people represented as speaking thus to Gog were on his side rather than with the Covenant people.] Thou comest out of thy place, thou and many nations with thee. . . . And I will judge him and his hordes and the many peoples that are with him.

As a commentary on this, how remarkable is the following account of the races which make up the Russian army, written by the famous newspaper correspondent, Mr. A. G. Hales:

"Kouropatkin has now 460,000 men of mixed sorts. But few of these belong to the gray-coated regulars. Possibly no nation has drawn such a mixed lot of men to the colors for centuries as Russia is doing now. I saw grim Tartars from the Crimea; Turcomans from Merv were bound for the same destination; they had their orders to be at Verchneudinsk within a given time, and they went as swiftly as men could go; Circassians from the Caucasus bivouacked on the shores of Lake Baikal with Buriat seal-hunters; thick-set, sturdy fellows from Archangel. Samoyedes, who had flocked from the far frozen valley of the Yenesei, Buriats, men of almost ox-like strength, but of small intelligence; Mongols, from the Trans-Baikal—a mixed and motley crowd. They spoke many tongues, dressed in many garbs, and carried weapons peculiar to their particular provinces.

"All were types of tribes and nations to whom the Czar is lord and ruler. They had come in droves, like rivers that could not be impeded in their course, because the Czar had called, and his voice reaches to the utmost bounds of his vast empire.

"They had come from herding cattle on the wind-swept steppes; they had come fresh from the plough or the threshing-floor; they had come from the gloomy mountain fastnesses where only the hunter goes; they had come from lakes that look like inland seas; from the mines, camps, and the splitters' huts. Their fathers and brothers and sons are coming after them in ceaseless waves—coming to the shambles like bulls that have been herded for the market. A fine, grand race of men, full of courage, honesty, and industry. They are the salt of the land they live in, and, before this disgusting carnival, which fools call glorious war, is over, so many of them will be lying dead—dead before their time.

"One cannot think of the coming holocaust without a shudder of despair and a sigh of unutterable contempt. For, one knows well, none of the vainglorious fools on either side who made this slaughter possible will be found in the fighting ranks."

Open-Air Preaching in Bulgaria

THE Bulgarians have been, as a nation, Christians for over a thousand years, but the preaching of the Gospel was practically unknown among them until the appearance of Protestant missionaries in 1858. Ever since, the Gospel has been regularly preached in the vernacular, in all the Protestant churches. In the national church, its reading is in the Slavic, and preaching is still prohibited. One reason for its prohibition is the superstition which has crept into the orthodox church, as it is falsely called. Christ's words find a literal fulfillment in the Bulgarian national church, that "the light shineth in the darkness and the darkness apprehended it not."

Now and then, there have been intelligent priests who have made attempts to preach the pure Gospel in the vernacular, but they were soon silenced by ecclesiastical authority, as is the case with priest Apostol Gearingieff, and ex-Priest Stoyan Lemenoff. Recently, a priests' Congress was convened in Sofia. As reported by the newspapers, one of its objects was to arrange for preaching in every church; but I have good reason to fear, that, even if such a vote was passed by the Congress, it will remain a dead letter.

It is gratifying, however, to know that in spite of the bitter persecution that has at times hindered the Protestants, they have never been wholly silenced. Regular preaching services have been held, even where there are but a few Protestants, and no regularly ordained pastor or preacher. At such places, the older and more experienced Christians have always been ready to take charge of the services.

Lately, open-air preaching services were inaugurated. Although there is a law in the country which compels all such meetings to be held under cover, the need of preaching the Gospel is so appreciated, that none has dared to hinder the efforts in that line.

Sofia has two beautiful public parks or gardens. The larger one, named Prince Baris Garden, in honor of the heir to the Bulgarian throne, is on the outskirts of the city. On Sundays, and on holidays, it is crowded by people of all classes. Formerly, many people took their evening walks in the direction of my church, and many used to drop in at our evening service. It occurred to me, some time ago, in view of decreased attendance, that if they will not come to us in the church, we should go to them. So on Sunday afternoons, accompanied by a number of singers, I now go to Prince Baris's Garden. We station ourselves under some shady trees and begin singing the Gospel hymns, which never fail to attract a crowd. Then I preach a Gospel sermon, or give a temperance talk. Last Sunday's service in the garden was especially profitable.

This new method of work in Bulgaria is being adopted by other pastors, and good results will surely follow. The good seed is being cast abroad, and in due time it will bear its fruit. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are earnestly requested to pray for the open-air preaching in Sofia.

Sofia, Bulgaria.

Distributing the Scriptures.

The New York Bible Society has just issued its eightieth report, showing a distribution during the year of 71,426 volumes of Scripture, in thirty different languages, of which 5,055 were Bibles, 11,204 New Testaments, and 55,167 were portions, the latter being usually one of the Gospels. Of the total distribution 42,408 volumes went to the immigrants at Ellis Island, 9,778 volumes were placed among the shipping of New York, 6,297 volumes were taken by the churches, Sunday-schools, missions, and public institutions, 12,943 volumes were placed in the hands of individuals and families through missionaries, canvassers, or at the office of the Society. The Society, which is entirely non-sectarian, is conducted by a Board of Managers representing all denominations. It trusts largely to contributions to enable it to carry on its important work.

The Little Armchair

Nobody sits in the little armchair,
It stands in a corner dim;
But a white-haired mother, gazing there,
And yearningly thinking of him,
Sees through the dusk of long ago
The bloom of her boy's sweet face,
As he rocks so merrily to and fro,
With a laugh that cheers the place.

Sometimes he holds a book in his hand,
Sometimes a pencil and slate;
And the lesson is hard to understand,
And the figures hard to mate;
But she sees the nod of the father's head,
So proud of his little son,
And she hears the words so often said,
"No fear for our little one."

They were wonderful days, the dear, sweet days,
When a child with sunny hair
Was hers to scold, to kiss, and to praise,
At her knee in the little chair.
She lost him back in her busy years,
When the great world caught the man,
And he strode away past hopes and fears
To his place in the battle's van.

But now and then in a wistful dream,
Like a picture out of date,
She sees a head with a golden gleam,
Bent over a pencil and slate.
And she lives again the happy day,
The day of her young life's spring,
When the small armchair stood just in the
The centre of everything.

The Title on the Cross

BY REV. EZRA T. SANFORD

IN letters of the Hebrew, Greek and Latin language, the Title was nailed to the Cross of Jesus. Tissot, in his superb collection of paintings representing the Life of Christ, has made one picture representing the Title. These words, transliterated, are very suggestive of the kings who have borne the titles in the different languages. David and Solomon were called "Melek," but "a greater than Solomon is here." Philip and Alexander were called great by the Greeks, but a greater than Alexander, who sought to conquer the world, is wielding the sceptre of sovereignty from his throne upon the Cross. The early Romans called their rulers by the term "Rex," but Christ is a ruler of all nations. We say "our king" because he is elected by our race to rule. He is "our king" because we are sons of God.

We may see, in these strange words, the fruition of the determinate plan of Almighty God. He was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

Again, here is that language which challenges the attention of thoughtful men in all ages—worthy the sayings of Greek philosophers or Latin poets; but more worthy is the sublime message which language conveys to the human heart. We also see in these words that climax of revelation destined to captivate the people of God for his service. The older revelations had their place in leading up to the coming of Christ. This is a case where Pilate wrote wiser than he knew.

The Plaint of the Pumpkin

() TOMMY, come and take me
From this cold and frosty field,
Your mother well will bake me,
To her tender hand I'd yield.

All my glorious golden yellow,
All my solid ripened heart,
I'd give to any fellow,
Who'd pick me up and start.

And to the kitchen speed him quickly,
Where it's warm and sweet and nice,
Where all the shelves are thickly Spread with fruit and Ceylon spice.

So, Tommy, come and get me,
I'm tired of this cold spot,
And afraid that you'll forget me,
Then sad will be my lot.

I've happy been in growing
For your mother's pumpkin pie;
Save my seeds for next year's sowing,
Now, Tommy, dear, good-bye.

How an Orphanage Was Founded

THE Genevieve Orphanage is the pet charity of the good people of Shreveport, La., and is supported entirely by voluntary contributions. Some time ago an offering of money was refused by the Board of Directors of the Orphanage, because there was no necessity for additional funds, which shows the generous attitude of the Shreveport public towards this beautiful philanthropy.

The orphanage had its beginning in Feb. 1889. One raw, cold evening, Rev. W. S. Penick, Baptist clergyman, was reading in his study, when the door opened, and a little girl in tattered clothes entered, telling him that her widowed mother, and little brother and sister, were hungry and cold. Money was given the child, and after she had left, Dr. Penick began thinking that a home for needy children was badly wanted in Shreveport. The thought had occurred to him before; but now he determined to make the matter a subject of special prayer. Calling upon some of his friends soon after, he asked them to assist him in founding an asylum for poor children, an appeal which met with instant response. One gave $500; several gave $50, $100 and $200, with the result that a cottage of four rooms was procured, in which five little children, including the girl whose presence on that cold evening had led his thoughts to a decision, and her brother and sister. A kind matron was found, and donations of food and other necessities poured in from every quarter.

Many benevolent persons have taken an interest in the Orphanage since then. Six years ago, a lady well-known for her good deeds in Shreveport, gave $6,000 for the erection of a pretty white cottage. It stands in four acres of ground, in which another friend, a gardener, planted grape vines, an orchard of peach, plum, and fig trees, besides sixteen sycamore trees. A big-hearted butcher furnished a soup bone every day. A generous baker donated bread. Another friend furnished five gallons of oil per month to the Orphanage. Ice was furnished gratuitously, and carfare on the electric line was never collected from the orphans. Books were donated, and money for a small book-room.

The orphanage received its name from the founder's baby daughter who met with an accidental death several months after the opening of the institution. Hundreds of little children have found comfortable homes at the Genevieve Orphanage. The average number of children cared for at one time is thirty.

Thanksgiving is always a happy time at the Orphanage, and at Christmas, Santa Claus comes with his big tree, every bough of which is loaded down with generous gifts. Throughout the year, the children have pleasant outings and picnics. One Jewish lady celebrates her little son's birthday at the Orphanage. Occasionally the children attend birthday parties of their small friends living outside the institution.

The children have always attended the public school. Recently, a public school building has been conveniently erected on a lot adjoining the institution. The Orphanage is non-sectarian. The Board of Directors is composed of two members each from the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Episcopal Churches, and the Jewish Synagogue. Mr. Isaac Barron, one of the best friends the Orphanage has ever had, is its present manager.

The "Prison Gate" Mission

Several letters have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commending the work of the "Prison Gate" Mission. H. writes: "I pray God that the 'Prison Gate' Mission may be a great success. I will do anything I can to help it, as I was helped myself in the hour of need, when my only alternative was prison or suicide." J. writes: "Chaplain Munro's work among the prisoners was made the means of my soul's resurrection." These are examples of other letters of a similar tone, from unfortunate men who have been led through shame and suffering to better lives, and who are in a position to appreciate the value of the "Prison Gate" Mission.

Deaf People Now Hear Whisper

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but A Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines? They make the Deaf hear distinctly. They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.

And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.

Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just glasses are sight-magnifiers.

They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and

And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, cause they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without friends having to shout back at them. They can be worn without straining. It is the straining that puts a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound str. hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface, thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound str. the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the drum that carries sound to the hearing nerve. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard clock strike can now hear that same clock tick a where in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzz, noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved, overcome (even after Ear Doctors have given up cases), by the use of these comfortable little Ear Resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops, Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 326 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Do not get it getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Write for it today to the Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1352 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

HARK! I Can Hear

You can be relieved of deafness, and head noises, too, by using

"THE WAY" EAR DRUMS Invisible, Comfortable, Safe.

WAY EAR DRUM CO., Room 303, Valpey Building, Detroit, Mich.

et this Machine do your Washing Free.

There are Motor Springs beneath the tub. These springs do nearly all the hard work, when you start them going. And this washing machine works as easy as a bicycle wheel does. There are slats on the inside bottom of the tub. These slats act as paddles, to swing the water in same direction you revolve the tub. You throw the soiled clothes into the tub first, then you throw enough water over the clothes to wet them.

Next you put the heavy wooden cover on top of the tub to anchor them, and to press them down. This cover has slats on its lower side to grip the tub and hold them from turning around when the tub turns.

Now, we are all ready for quick and easy washing. You grasp the upright handle on the side of the band, with it, you revolve the tub one-third way around, till it strikes a motor-spring.

This motor-spring throws the tub back till it strikes the other motor-spring, which in turn throws back on the first motor-spring.

The machine must have a little help from you, at every swing, but the motor-springs, and the ball-arings, do practically all the hard work.

You can sit in a rocking chair and do all that the labor requires of you. A child can run it easily if of clothes.

When you revolve the tub the clothes don't move. But the water moves like a mill race through the tub.

The paddles on the tub bottom drive the soapy water THROUGH and through the clothes at every swing of the tub. Back and forth, in and out of every fold, and through every mesh in the cloth, the hot soapy water runs like a torrent. This is how it carries away all the dirt from the clothes, in from six to ten minutes by the clock.

It drives the dirt out through the meshes of the clothes WITHOUT ANY RUBBING, without any TEAR and TEAR from the washboard.

It will wash the finest lace fabric without breaking thread, or a button, and it will wash a heavy, dirty spot with equal ease and rapidity. Fifteen to twenty garments, or five large bed-sheets, can be washed at one time with this "1900" Washer.

A child can do this in six to twelve minutes better than any able washer-woman could do the same thing in TWICE the time, with three times the wear and tear from the washboard.

This is what we SAY, now how do we PROVE it? We send you our "1900" Washer free of charge, on all month's trial, and we even pay the freight out our own pockets.

No cash deposit is asked, no notes, no contract, security.

You may use the washer four weeks at our expense. If you find it won't wash as many clothes in FOUR hours as you can wash by hand in EIGHT hours you send it back to the railway station, — at all.

But, if, from a month's actual use, you are convinced it saves HALF the time in washing, does the work better, and does it twice as easily as it could be done by hand, you keep the machine.

Then you mail us 50 cents a week till it is paid for. Remember that 50 cents is part of what the machine saves you every week on your own, or on a washer-woman's labor. We intend that the "1900" washer shall pay for itself and thus cost you nothing.

You don't risk a cent from first to last, and you don't buy it until you have had a full month's trial. Could we afford to pay freight on thousands of these machines every month, if we did not positively VOW they would do all we claim for them? Can we afford to be without a machine that will do your washing in HALF THE TIME, with half the wear and tear of the washboard, when you can have that machine for a month's free trial, and let it PAY FOR ITSELF? This offer may be withdrawn at any time it overcrows our factory.

Write us TODAY, while the offer is still open, and let you think of it. The postage stamp is all you need. Write me personally on this offer, viz.: B. F. Ober, General Manager of "1900" Washer Company, 334 North Henry St., Binghamton, New York.

REFORMATION IN JUDAH

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW came it that Hezekiah should have been a really good king?

First of all, he may have had a pious mother in Abijah, the daughter of "the prophet Zechariah, who had understanding in the visions of God" (II. Chron. 26: 5), not, of course, to be confounded with the Zechariah of the minor prophets, who was contemporary with Zerubbabel and Haggai. Then Hezekiah had the great privilege of having the prophet Isaiah as his friend. Zechariah, his grandfather, probably knew the rising prophet Isaiah, and, no doubt, he used all his influence to bring the young prince, who had such an awful example of sin in his wicked father, under the influence of Isaiah. God had allowed the enemies of Judah to press Ahaz on every side, but far from bowing under the mighty hand of God, he committed sacrilege: took away a portion of the Temple, dealing with it as his private property, and gave it unto the king of Assyria. He also sacrificed to the gods of Assyria, under the mad delusion that because the Assyrians succeeded in war, so should he, if he served their gods. And Ahaz destroyed the vessels of the house of God, shut up the Temple, "made him altars in every corner of Jerusalem," and introduced idolatry into every city of Judah (II. Chron. 28: 16-25).

Into such an atmosphere Hezekiah was born and lived, till he was twenty-five years of age, when his wretched father died. God had prepared him for his vocation as a reformer, and he lost no time. He had not reigned a month before he began to introduce a thorough reformation in Jerusalem, by opening the doors of the Temple and repairing them. He called upon the priests and Levites to come and help him, and insisted on it that they should sanctify themselves in the first place, and then sanctify the house of the God of their fathers; and he, the king, confessed the sins of his people, and publicly declared that all the trouble which had come upon them was due to their sin against God. This is a wonderful pattern for preparing the way for an awakening. Let the teachers and leaders of a people be of one heart to sanctify themselves; to put themselves at God's disposal, and together own that theirs is the blame for all the trouble; and the Spirit of God finds prepared ground on which to work, and many souls will be found ready to turn unto the Lord.

Hezekiah declared to the priests and Levites: "Now, it is in mine heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel, that his fierce wrath may turn away from us." The king had taken to heart the message of Isaiah, and God's message through him: he recognized the picture which the Holy Spirit drew through his prophet (Isa. 1) of Judah and Jerusalem, as he saw them; and in response to the appeal, "Come, now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord," etc., this young king said in his heart, "I am ready: it is in my heart to make a covenant with the Lord." It was no light thing for this young man to thus bear witness for his God, when all Israel had turned aside and every city in Judah practiced the idolatry which had become the state religion of the country. All public acts at the time must have been accompanied with idolatrous practices; marriage and funerals celebrated and accompanied with the same, and the young king and the prophet stood alone in their witness for the living God.

Make Money as the Astors Made It

What $5 or $10 a Month Will Do

Deposited With the United Cities Realty Corporation

OF COURSE you have heard of the Astors of New York? You know that they are multi-millionaires. You also probably know that their vast fortunes were made through real estate investments. William Waldorf Astor visited this country a few weeks ago to find that his holdings had increased in value to the extent of twenty millions of dollars in the last seven years. The result was that he increased the rents of his various properties so as to bring him one million dollars more annually.

There are not many Astors. Few individuals have the means to do what they have done. Still the vast possibilities have long ago been understood by the ablest financiers in New York City, and the result has been many combinations of rich men to purchase such properties as made the Astors wealthy. Numerous small organizations or syndicates have been formed, and the shares are so closely held by them that they are not obtainable in the open market. A few shares of the stock of one such organization in Brooklyn found their way into the open market not long ago and were immediately snapped up at $131 per share, though the corporation pays only 5 per cent. annually.

Now there are millions of people who would be only too glad to have an opportunity to invest in the kind of property these wealthy men buy, but until the organization of the United Cities Realty Corporation they could not do so. This corporation is especially designed to successfully handle the savings of people of moderate means to whom the safety of the money they pay in is the prime factor.

Though only two years old the corporation owns a million dollars' worth of property in several of the fastest growing cities of the country, and independent appraisals by experts show a continuous increase in the value of its holdings.

Income-producing real estate in the centers of growing cities is conceded to be the best possible investment. The wisest people in the most conservative cities (such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, etc.) have placed trust funds in that kind of property. Panics may come and panics may go, but you will invariably find that the best business properties in the most active centers of progressive cities are always occupied. We buy only this class of real estate, and once it is in our possession we manage it so that the highest possible income may be derived.

You can participate in this enterprise of dividends being held for reinvestment. When the earnings become 10 per cent. or 11 per cent., which is extremely probable within a reasonable time, your dividends will be increased. Increased earnings mean increased value, and as you are a part owner of the properties acquired by the United Cities Realty Corporation your share will increase in value in proportion to the whole.

Just to give you an idea of the sort of properties we buy:—about two weeks ago we closed a deal for the Nicollet Block in Minneapolis. Any resident of Minneapolis will tell you that the Nicollet Block is one of the very best investment properties in that city, and it yields us an income through rentals alone of 11 per cent. above all expenses, and, by the way, we have leased this property for a term of ten years, thus insuring a continuance of this income.

Surely if a man of wide experience and highest personal character came to you and said, "I have a piece of property which I will purchase and manage for you at the lowest possible cost if you will invest $5000, I will charge you no salary, will give you the first 5 per cent. earned, and will divide with you equally any profits above 5 per cent.," wouldn't such a proposition strike you as being very fair?

Well, that is exactly the proposition we make. You can secure an interest in all properties of the United Cities Realty Corporation for as little as $120, or, as much as you like, on instalments or for cash. Subscriptions for $600 or less can be paid for at $5 a month; between $600 and $1200, $10 a month, etc., etc. If your purchase amounts to $1200 or more, we will insure your life for the entire amount of your contract in one of the best life insurance companies in America. The insurance provides for the delivery of full paid shares to your heirs without further payment should you die before the maturity of your contract. Even if you do not eventually make an investment with us, you at least owe it to yourself and your family to make full inquiry. A postal to the undersigned will bring particulars.

for $5 or $10 a month, or as much more as you desire, and though your individual contribution may be small, the aggregate of many such enables us to do precisely what the Astors have done. You will be a partner in holdings as valuable, and the first earnings go to you as profit. The preferred shares which we offer you are already paying dividends of 6 per cent. per annum, and the earnings of the corporation are over 9 per cent., all earnings in excess

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A Chat with Pastor Wagner

IT was a day of bright, sparkling sunshine. New York's principal streets were crowded with gay holiday shoppers, and Broadway was almost impassable, owing to the multitude who thronged the sidewalks and streamed in and out of the stores. Women predominated, and all ages and conditions were represented. The brilliant displays in the shop windows drew in a steady stream of buyers.

It was a scene to remind the thoughtful observer of the "Vanity Fair," pictured by Bunyan. Everybody was intent on fashion and worldly display; dresses, jewels, ornaments of all sorts, gewgaws and trinkets, and a thousand other articles to please the fancy or gratify the love of finery, were there on exhibition. Amid the hum of traffic and the babble of voices, one could hear on the street corner a book vender calling out to the passers-by, "Here's your greatest book of the season! Simple Life, only ten cents!"

He felt that he had been specially called to do this work, and to become the advocate among all classes, rich and poor, of the nobler, more spiritual and less worldly manner of living.

"When I first began to preach this plain Gospel in Paris, it was in a small hall. Very few people would come to hear me; the rich were not interested and stayed away; the poor came, but they did not continue. Only the young and a few others were interested, so I preached in the mission largely to the children in those early years.

"Then the older people began to come in crowds, and they urged me to become their pastor; but I said, 'No, you are not serious enough yet. You are still too unsettled and you would not remain. I will preach to the young.' I kept them off for two years, and then they came to me again and urged me very earnestly to become their pastor, and I consented. By this time they came in crowds to listen to the plain doctrine I ing many students," Pastor Wagner added, "Dr. Beach is doing a splendid work among them, and is a grand man. He once asked me to speak to them, but at that time I could not do so, being unable to speak in English. I am glad now that I learned the language."

One of his hearers inquired whether it were true that the tendency of France to-day is toward infidelity, as has sometimes been charged. This Pastor Wagner warmly denied.

"I have met some of those who are called atheists," he said, "and have convinced them that they were not atheists, as they thought, but that they had their own ideal, and worshiped an 'unknown God.'"

Pastor Wagner further said that a great spiritual change was now in progress among the people of France, and especially the peasantry. For the character of the French peasant he had a most cordial admiration.

"Ah, the peasant! He is one who is serious and who thinks, and he wishes to live as God would have him. I have lived among them and I know them. They are wonderful people, those peasants of France. You give them work to do, and they work honestly, and the work is good and it remains; and they live in their homes quiet, orderly lives, year after year, those good, honest, true people, and they don't change and run away. You go to the large cities like Paris, and the working people you find there change from place to place, and have no abiding home; they work for you and the work is not enduring and satisfactory; and so they come and go. But you return to the country after ten, or even twenty years and—there you still find the peasant in his own home, contented with his simple surroundings, and living the same quiet existence. He is a serious, well-meaning man, the French peasant."

Pastor Wagner then spoke of the remarkable evangelical work inaugurated by Dr. Robert, on undenominational lines, among the peasants and the working-classes generally in the south and west of France. This work has already produced a great spiritual harvest, and is so widespread that it may be said to have revolutionized a considerable section of the country. It is a work full of promise. Incidentally, Pastor Wagner said some Catholic priests have become converts, with their whole congregations, and are now preaching the Gospel on Protestant lines. There is nothing sensational in Dr. Robert's movement; it is a religious revival of the most conservative kind, yet its results are such as to leave no doubt that they will be permanent. On his return to France, Pastor Wagner will arrange to send a detailed account of this most interesting work to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HIS TALL FORM FILLED THE DOORWAY

The Simple Life in the midst of Vanity Fair—could contrast be greater?

There is probably no book which has such a vogue just now as this famous little volume of Christian philosophy, by Pastor Charles Wagner, the Mission preacher of Paris, who is visiting this country.

On the same day of the scene above described, Pastor Wagner entered THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House. He came unannounced, his tall, athletic form filling the doorway, and a smile lighting up his ruddy face. The Alsatian is a well-preserved man of fifty-two, broad-shouldered, and with a physique which suggests athletic power. A slight stoop betrays the student. He stood irresolute for a moment.

"Pardon me," he began. "I came to see a gentleman—I quite forget his name—the man who went to India, Finland and Norway, to feed those famine people."

This unconventional introduction sufficed, and a moment later Pastor Wagner was ensconced in the biggest and easiest leather chair in the editorial sanctum. Warmly greeted by Dr. Klopsch and associates, he began to talk freely of his American visit and his work at home.

When one remembers that Charles Wagner, with a thousand other matters demanding his attention, mastered English in a year, it is surprising to listen to his conversation in that language. Although he speaks with a strong accent, his vocabulary is excellent and his grammar unexceptionable. The pastor, of course, like every educated Alsatian, speaks both French and German.

"I visited America, not merely to preach and lecture, or because of the kind reception your country has given my books," he said, "but because I desire to know your people; to meet them face to face and talk with them heart to heart. Your countrymen have taken up The Simple Life with great enthusiasm," he continued, smiling.

Being asked concerning his work at home, he said: "It is twenty-three years ago since I began the work on which I am now engaged. My purpose was to present to my own people a clearer view of practical religion, which all might understand, and to bring to them a definite comprehension of the purpose for which we are placed in this world."

"IT IS JUST THE COMMON PEOPLE TO WHOM THIS SIMPLE GOSPEL APPEALS"

set before them—the doctrine of Jesus Christ, with no dogmatic theology or denominationalism whatsoever.

"And so it continued, and they kept coming in increasing numbers, until we could no longer accommodate them; but it was still distinctly a mission; indeed, my work to-day is rather that of a mission than church. There are among my people two classes: the poor, or working class, and the educated, or student class—not the rich. So it is just the common people, and the educated, but comparatively poor students to whom this gospel of humanity, which reaches the heart, appeals. To the rich, who are engrossed in the pleasures and vanity of the world, it has little attraction.

"It has been a joy to me," he continued, with a fine enthusiasm lighting up his features, "to know that my work has been the means of lifting up thousands, and leading them to better lives. This knowledge brings comfort and satisfaction, that one's efforts have been so honored with blessing."

"There are thousands of Americans in Paris, includ-

Faith's Footprints

TEXT—Heb. 11:1

"Faith is the evidence of things not seen"

WHAT is evidence? Testimony. Proof. Demonstration. It is a statement of facts made in court by a witness, by which a juror is led to believe something that his eyes have not seen nor his ears heard. It is the alibi by which a man proves that he could not have been on the scene of a crime. It is the proof which a wrongly evicted owner produces of his right and title to an inheritance. It is an argument from admitted and existing facts, to prove the operation of causes remote in time. It is the means by which Truth defends itself against the onslaught of Error, and the weapon with which she overthrows the fortresses of superstition and false doctrine.

Evidence of the unseen has a momentous mission. For the greater number of us it is the only basis we have for our knowledge. If we were to believe in nothing that we have not ourselves seen, we should have to give up our belief in facts and events innumerable. "It is not necessary for me to go and see London before I believe that there exists such a city as London," once wrote a great Bible commentator, in reference to my text. I know that such a place as St. Petersburg exists, although I have not seen it. Why? I am convinced by the testimony of those who have seen it. The "evidence of things not seen" has proved to me that it exists. I have read books written about the city of St. Petersburg. I have seen pictures of the great buildings of that Russian capital; its cathedrals, its royal palaces, its memorial halls on its magnificent boulevards. I have heard my friends, who have traveled among the Muscovites, describe its bridges and its citadels. Why should I then doubt St. Petersburg exists, although my eyes have never seen it?

A Rational Faith

Days before Christopher Columbus landed at San Salvador, he knew he was approaching land. The Genoese Admiral and his fleet had been sailing on, week in and week out. The mutterings of a sailors' mutiny grew louder and louder in the fore-castle. At last a delegation waited upon their commander, and practically said: "Columbus, you are sailing away to certain death. We will never find land in this direction. Either you turn ship, and head towards home, or we will pitch you overboard and go home anyway." "Give me just three days longer of a Western course, and then, if unsuccessful, I will turn back," answered the great captain. Within the three days, branches of trees were seen floating past the boats. "There is land," cried Columbus. "Men, see, there is land! By yonder tree-branches, we have the evidence of it." For days and weeks the old North American Indians could follow their foes by the tracks left upon the ground by the enemy. They could tell by those tracks how many men, how many women, how many children, how many horses, and how many wagons and cattle, composed the party ahead. They could unerringly read all these facts by the "evidence of things not seen." In the same way in which the Indian warriors of old followed their enemies by visible signs, we may find the "Footprints of the Man of Galilee;" not only in Palestine, but also in all sacred history. We may prove, by the same process, that Jesus is not a mere vision, and that our Gospel faith is not merely a poetic dream. They are far more than these. Our faith is rational. It is founded upon the conclusive "evidence of things not seen."

First, our faith is rational. Its geographical foundation stones are strong and true, and well anchored. I not only find "The Footprints of the Man of Galilee" visible all through Palestine, but as Doctor Thomson once wrote, I find the Land and the Book are one. I find, by going among the Holy Hills, that Jesus was not a mythical character, living among mythical people in a mythical age. Christ was God; Christ, was also a man. He lived, he breathed, he walked, he slept, he ate among those Hebrew people of the East, as one of themselves. We can find the place of his birth. We can find the places where he passed his boyhood, where he went as a man; where he died; where he was resurrected, and the hill from which he ascended.

The Land and the Book are one. The personality of Jesus Christ, in the first place, has a true, a vitally true, geographical setting. No Bible student ever walked the Judean Hills with eyes truly opened to the divine truth, that he did not have his belief in Jesus Christ irrevocably sealed and infinitely strengthened by the conformation of Eastern customs and geographical facts with the recorded biographies of Christ's life.

A Scholar's Conversion

Henry A. Harper, the author of that marvelous book, entitled, The Bible and Modern Discoveries, presses home this statement upon his readers in a powerful way. On one of Dr. Harper's pages I find these words: "A very dear friend of mine, a splendid explorer, a great traveler, was at heart and in secret an unbeliever in the divinity of Jesus Christ. Circumstances compelled him to explore Palestine. To understand the country, he found that he must read the Bible, and reading it in the full blaze of light, which custom and country and modern investigations threw on it, he found that Jesus was indeed his Saviour. He brought the full power of his able mind to bear on all he read and all he saw, and as a result of those geographical studies and the Christ life, in humble adoration he bowed before his God and Redeemer. There was no sudden, no violent change. All had been noiselessly and gradually accomplished. He was convinced of the divinity of Jesus Christ by the witnesses of the dust." I might go on and quote scores of testimonies just like Dr. Harper's, in reference to the harmonies of the Christ-life with the geographical facts and the Hebrew customs of the Palestine hills.

Studying to-day the "evidence of the things not seen," in reference to Jesus Christ, is there nothing rational, nothing overwhelming to you in the harmony between the opened leaves of Eastern rocks and the biographies of the Four Gospels? Is there nothing marvelous to you in the fact that there is not a detail in all Christ's earthly life which cannot be verified by the rocks of the Palestine hills and valleys, which are absolutely in accord with one another? The men who wrote the Bible were not historical novelists, like the authors of the Tower of London, or of Kenilworth, or of Romola, or of The Crisis. They did not accept historical facts when they wanted to use them for the benefit of their plots, and reject those facts when it did not suit their convenience to use them. They did not put Christ in imaginary places at impossible times, and put fictitious and impossible statements in his mouth. Almost every detail of Christ's earthly life can be verified by geographical position and Eastern custom. That classic book of travels, written by Richard Henry Dana, called Two Years Before the Mast, is supposed to contain a perfect geographical account of the early coast of Southern California and its people. But the Bible is a more wonderful guide-book to the Holy Land than Dana's masterpiece could ever be to California. The best guide-book through the Holy Land ever written, is the Bible. In its every detail the Christ-life is found to have a perfect geographical setting. Is there nothing wonderful to you that the Land and the Book, in reference to Christ's life, are one?

Christ's Footprints in Palestine

Jesus was not a mythological character. "Before you can obliterate the story of Jesus Christ from this earth, on which he so sublimely lived, you will have to grind out of sight and forever erase the sacred hills of Palestine," once wrote David Gregg, in a book for which authorship he was elected an honorary member of the Royal Geographical Society of London. "You will forever have to grind out of sight the sacred hills of Palestine, where Christ was tempted, and where he preached his wonderful sermon, and where he was transfigured, and where he died and where he ascended. God be praised for the Gospel, according to geography! God be praised for the Holy Land with its Jordan and Bethlehem and Hermon and Zion and Calvary and Olivet! These are all indestructible pages of the divine and indestructible book! These are all witnesses that Christ has spoken to men and lived among men and wrought out salvation for man." Christ was a God. Yes, Christ was a man! By the evidence of the pages of rock, I know it!

But we find Christ as the "evidence of things not seen" in another way. By the fulfilment of scripture prophecies, in reference to his birth, his life, his death and his resurrection, we know that the prophecies of his second coming will be fulfilled, as well as was his first coming. We know there will come a time when upon the white horse of victory, Christ shall ride down the blue hillsides of heaven. He shall come to put his enemies under his feet. He shall come to claim his own. For then his name shall be written "King of kings and Lord of lords." We know by the words, his own lips, that as he has gone to heaven for a little while, to prepare a place for his children, so he will come again and receive them unto himself, that where he is there they may be also.

The prophetic studies of the Bible are among the most instructive and fascinating of all the Scriptures. But in order to limit our studies, let us confine our thoughts for but a brief moment, to the wonderful birth and life and death of Jesus Christ. No rational man can read the fulfilled prophecies in reference to the birth of Jesus and not declare that his nativity was divine. When the wise men came to Jerusalem to find the new-born King, who was yet to be "King of kings and Lord of lords," what answer was given to the Oriental strangers by those learned in the Hebrew law? They promptly answered, "In Bethlehem," and gave for their authority the words of the prophet Micah, who lived a thousand years before Christ was born. When the wise men went to Bethlehem, they found there the infant Christ, as Micah had foretold. Is this fulfilled prophecy a startling evidence that Jesus was born a man, yet, that he was the Being who divine attributes were foreseen by the prophets?

Footprints in Prophecy

If, as a rational man, I want to find the proof that Christ is some day going to return to earth to claim his disciples as his own, all that I have got to do is to turn to the prophecies of Isaiah and read, first, the account of Christ's birth and earthly life. "He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he was brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." Did not the prophecy of Isaiah, written eight hundred years before Christ died, come true? Then will not also Isaiah's prophecy come true, which declares that "there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse," who shall make the "lion eat straw like an ox and the sucking child play on the hole of the asp?" For then "the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth, even as the waters cover the seas." Oh, my brother, if you believe that Christ's birth was a divine fact, then, by the "evidence of things not seen," you should also believe that Christ is coming again to claim his own.

But the divinity of Jesus Christ is found in the testimony of Christ's contemporaries, as well as in the prophecies of those inspired men who lived hundreds of years before Christ was born. It is not only found in the Gospel biographers of Jesus, who knew Christ personally, but also in the testimony of such mighty personalities as that of Paul, who was martyred in Rome about 67 A.D., and Ignatius, who was martyred about 100 A.D., and Polycarp, who lived to be nearly ninety years old, and was martyred in 155 A.D. These men did not live hundreds of years after Christ was born. In direct touch with events, they were able to prove by their own eyes and ears if Christ was a fraud, whether Jesus truly placed the stamp of his divinity upon his life's work, by the miracles he wrought.

Inspired his Followers

Explain away the prophecies? Oh, that is impossible! And yet, it would be no less difficult to explain away the testimonies of the contemporaries of Jesus Christ who declare that Christ was divine. Why? Because as I read those testimonies, I find, with but one exception, or possibly two, they were all sealed with the blood of martyrdom. Here is the honor roll: Matthew was slain with a sword in Ethiopia; Mark was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, until his brains were dashed out, and the matted hair stuck to the walls of the rocks; Luke's mode of death is not known positively, but tradition says he was slain for Christ; John the only apostle who died a natural death, was not only exiled, but also cast into a caldron of boiling oil; "James the Great," was beheaded in Jerusalem; "James the

Commander Booth-Tucker's Farewell

COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER

THE great auditorium of the Grand Central Palace in New York was filled to overflowing on the recent occasion of the farewell of the Salvation Army to their beloved Commander Booth-Tucker. All were eager to show their leader how much they loved him, and appreciated the work he has accomplished since assuming the conduct of the affairs of the Army, eight and a-half years ago. The organization has increased in numbers and financially very nearly threefold during that time, and while many influences have been at work to bring this about, the labors of Commander Booth-Tucker and his lamented wife, the Consul, have been a wonderful power. It will be remembered that the sad and tragic death occurred about a year ago in the Western railroad accident.

In closing a most eloquent and touching farewell address, Commander

Booth-Tucker said:

"The work done is not due to me, but to the men and women around me. I would take the opportunity of extending my heartfelt thanks to the Churches, who have all helped us so kindly and generously; the Y. M. C. A., the W. C. A., the W. C. U., and other organizations of like character; to the business men of this and other cities, and to the great newspapers which have generously thrown open their columns to me."

The speaker believed Americans led the world in the work of salvation. He ascribed his own conversion to the preaching of an American—"that glorious American, Dwight L. Moody." With sincere thanks and a "God bless you all," the Commander brought his address to a close. The choir of two hundred Salvationists then sang, "Jesus, my Saviour, I will Follow Thee," both words and music composed by Booth-Tucker:

Jesus, my Saviour, I will follow thee,
What though my pathway strewn with thorns may be!
Thou for my ransom shed'st thy precious blood—
Jesus, I'll follow thee through flame and flood!

The refrain was taken up by thousands of voices, and sung again and again:

Jesus, only thee, thee, only thee:
Jesus, my Saviour, I will follow thee.

A message from Gen. Booth was read, and then came a most unique and original number. From the back of the platform came in single file, alternate men and women Soldiers, each carrying a red-white-and-blue shield, upon which were the coats-of-arms of the different States of the Union. As they ascended the platform, each paused before Booth-Tucker, presenting him with a paper, which proved to be a message from the Governor of the State represented by the shield-bearer. These letters were read to the audience by Col. Higgins. All were commendatory of the work and influence of the Army, regret at the departure of the leader, and wishing him God-speed on his journey and a return sometime to this country. The last man in the line carried a beautiful silk flag of our Union, and when, after reading a short, strong message conveying in unmistakable terms the writer's opinion of the work of the Salvation Army, the enthusiasm of the audience broke loose, and cheer after cheer greeted the name of Theodore Roosevelt as it was read.

Next came delegations, or representatives from all the foremost countries of the globe, dressed in the national costume, two men and two women of each nation. They came from the entrance down the broad centre aisle, each carrying a large flag of their country. As they came the band played a national air, and after saluting the Commander, the couples passed off the stage and grouped themselves on the space in front of the platform. Their diversified costumes, gay with many colors, and the different flags, made a most brilliant and pleasing picture. Last of all came the Goddess of Liberty and Uncle Sam, which was the signal for the band to strike up the stirring strains of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." At the same moment, auditorium and balconies became a perfect sea of flags, made of silk and bunting. The sight was simply overwhelming. Every available wall space was draped with flags and tricolors, and the waving of the flags in hundreds of hands was electrical. Everybody arose, joining with a will in the strains of the patriotic hymn. This was followed by a farewell song to the well-known "Blue Bell" music.

Now came to many the most touching scene of the whole service. The audience was requested to remain where they were, while the Commander and his family left the hall by way of the central aisle. A most pathetic little procession now made its way toward the door, the Commander with his white-robed babe in his arms, while the great audience sang, "God be with You Till we Meet Again." Many eyes filled at the sight.

A beautiful monument has been erected in Kensico Cemetery, by the officers of the Salvation Army to the memory of Mrs. Booth-Tucker, which was dedicated a few days previous to her husband's departure for England. During the Commander's administration in America the general property advances of the Army have been amazing. At the commencement of his work the property holdings amounted to something in the neighborhood of $650,000; now they are nearing the $2,000,000 mark.

as" was hurled from the top of the Temple to the ground, and there beaten to death with a club; Stephen is stoned to death; Philip was hanged; St. Bartholomew was flayed alive—that means his skin was peeled from his quivering flesh while he was yet conscious, bystanders standing about the sufferer at the time and mocking him; Andrew preached from the cross while the people scoffed at his dying agonies; Thomas was pierced by a lance; Simon Zelotes was killed in Persia; Mattathias was murdered; Paul, Polycarp, Papias and scores of others, were all, as I said before, martyred.

Is it rational to suppose that those men, who lived in Christ's time, who were able to verify his miracles, would have been willing to endure hardship and persecution, and finally to lay down their lives for Christ, if they knew him to be an impostor? Why, the supposition is absurd! The Christian disciples who lived as contemporaries of Jesus Christ would never have been willing to come by night and steal his body from the tomb, and then be willing to be martyred to make good their false claim that Christ had risen from the dead. These men are not fools, any more than you and I are fools. Before you explain away the divinity of Jesus Christ, you must explain away the writings of Paul, of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, of Polycarp and Ignatius. When we consider "the evidence of things not seen," let us not doubt the testimony of these contemporaries of Christ who proved the sincerity and truth of their record, by living rather than deny it.

But not only do we find the "Footprints of the Man of Galilee" marked, side by side with the footprints of his disciples, who lived eighteen hundred years ago, but also with his disciples who are living by our side at the present day. And, wonderful to state, Christ's footprints are best revealed when he has been walking with the vilest of modern sinners and outcasts, as they were when he walked by the side of Mary Magdalen, and talked with the woman at the well of Samaria and followed Zaccheus to a despised publican's house, built by the stolen moneys of a Roman tax-collector.

Oh, Christ worked some wonderful miracles when he was upon earth among the publicans and the sinners! But I do not believe a greater example of his power over sin and disease was ever more convincingly manifested than when he alleviated the sufferings of those unhappy maniacs, whom the writers of that time describe as being possessed by devils. That was a vivid picture that Christmas Evans drew of the return to his home of that man whose home was among the tombs, where he dwelt like a wild beast, a misery to himself and a terror to others. No sooner was he delivered by the mighty word of Christ, than he started off to hunt up his wife and children. No sooner did the wife see him coming, than she was struck dumb with fear. Then she cried: "Run, children! Run to the house and bar the doors—your father is coming! Run, or he may kill us!" The family hastened into the house, while the older boy started off to the neighbors for help. They barred and barricaded the windows and the doors of the house. The smaller children began to cry with fear. The older children knew if their father, possessed of a thousand devils, should ever be able to batter down the door of the house he might slay them. But, strange to say, as the trembling wife and children saw the father and husband come nearer, instead of seeing him foaming at the mouth and flashing his eyes and of hearing him rave with his cursing lips, they saw him with a loving smile upon his happy face. He kept calling to his wife: "Mary, open the door. Do not be afraid. It is I, your husband, freed from all my devils. Mary, open! Jesus has saved me! Jesus has saved me!"

That was a wonderful description Christmas Evans drew of the poor maniac who had been possessed with the thousand devils among the Gadarene tombs. But is the scene of that liberated Hebrew returning home any more wonderful than the scenes many of us have witnessed, when we saw the drunkards who have been rescued by Christ from the devils of drink; and the outcasts who have been rescued by Christ, and the seven deviled Marys of this age who have been rescued by Christ, all returning to their homes? Is the scene of the poor Gadarene maniac, rescued by Christ, any more marvelous than the scene of a Gough, or a Woolley, or a Jerry McAuley, who have been exorcised of their thousand devils during our present generation? And if Christ to-day is going down among the lowest of the low to rescue fallen men and women, have we not a right to include among the "evidence of things not seen," these slaves of sin among ourselves who have been rescued by his power? Is it too much to ask of you, who know of these wonderful transformations, to believe in that miracle of Gadara? Have I not the right to claim that you not only accept the miracle, but that you trust the miracle worker, and test in your own persons the "evidence of things not seen."

Our Correspondent's Experiences with the Russians at Moukden and Harbin

By FREDERICK A. NORTH

THE ancient city of Moukden, the present centre of great military operations, is the capital of Manchuria, and is situated on a plain in the southern part of that province, 200 miles north of Port Arthur, and 300 miles south of Harbin. It has a population of 250,000, and is located in the midst of a fertile country, surrounded on all sides by vast fields of millet, which afford a rich supply of food for the people. Moukden is a walled city. There is an outer wall of earthwork, circular in form, surrounding the entire town, and an inner wall of brick, in the form of a square, enclosing only the chief part of the city. The inner wall is entered by eight gates, two on each side.

Some of the things of chief interest to me in and around Moukden were the execution grounds, just west of the city walls, the Chinese prison, the drum tower and huge bell, the tombs of the ancient kings, the imperial palace, the imperial post-office, the Russian post-office, the Russo-Chinese bank, the Manchurian hotel, the Roman Catholic Church, the Russo-Greek Church, the Mission of the United Free Church of Scotland, the railway station, the camps of soldiers, the Red Cross field hospitals, the walls and great gates of the city, and the peculiar customs of the people.

A large portion of my time was spent in the vicinity of the railway station, the headquarters of the army, which is two miles to the west of the city walls. On arriving here from Hsinmintun, as stated in my letter of three weeks ago, two fellow travelers and myself were placed in charge of the police at the railway station, until our passports could be examined and our presence at the seat of war could be thoroughly inquired into by the commandant. Everything was hurry and bustle, seemingly without order or system. Trains were arriving from Harbin, reinforcements were leaving for the battle-field of Liao-Yang, and the wounded were coming in from the front. Russian officers and men were so numerous that I could scarcely find a place to stand or sit, much less to lie down for the night to sleep.

Two of us obtained permission to go out to wash ourselves and buy food, on condition that we would return the next forenoon to receive our passports. There was no danger of our running away without these official documents, for no person can travel in the Russian Empire without his passport. After bathing in a pond of clear water, a mile northwest of the station, where the sand had been dug out for grading the railroad, as night came on we began to cast about for a place to sleep, for we were tired out. There was no room for us at the station, where even the army officers, telegraph operators, postal clerks, and gendarmes were obliged to sleep on the floor, to say nothing of the common soldiers covering the platform and sleeping in every nook. We could not pass the Russian guards at the gates into the city without our papers. Through the twilight we discovered a soldier's box car, on the siding at the sand bank. Into this car we crawled just like two New York up-State tramps. Soon the fleas drove me, half distracted, out of the car, and climbing up the fourteen-foot bank I shook my blanket, spread it out and made my bed on the millet ground, where it was so dark that the heads of the bunches of tall grain looked like Chinese robbers. The sky was overcast, the air as warm as corresponding late August weather in New York. The summer climate of Manchuria is like that of New York, but in winter all of that vast portion lying north of Moukden is as cold as Canada at Montreal, though not with such heavy snow-fall. After calculating on the possibility of being captured by the Hung-hoozas, I fell asleep. . . . Next day our passports were returned to us, and again I was asked why I desired to return to America by way of the Trans-Siberian railroad. To this I responded as before, that I wanted to reach New York in October to fill appointments to lecture on the Russo-Japanese War. I was then told that I was perfectly free to go when and where I chose.

officer told me that his government would continue to pour troops into Manchuria, stopping nothing short of 700,000 men, and that the Japanese must ultimately leave Manchuria, if it took years to accomplish it. Port Arthur would be retaken by the Russians, should it now fall into the hands of the Japanese. Russia declared, has come to Manchuria to stay.

The Russian soldier is plainly equipped, wearing a blouse, a nut-brown cap, and high top-boots; he carries his blanket, overcoat, knapsack, canteen, and a magazine gun, fitted with a pointed bayonet, and holding metallic cartridges. His accoutrement differs somewhat from that of the Jap, who wears a coat instead of a blouse, and leggings instead of high top-boots, and has a star in the front of his cap, instead of the Russian oval cockade. His gun is fitted with a sword bayonet, but is of about equal efficiency with that of the Russian. The Russian soldiers, a strong healthy class of men, in camp or on train, are good natured and happy, frequently singing and dancing to the music of the accordion. They do not appear to dread the deadly bullets of the Japs, that they may be called upon to face. The whole journey by rail from Russia, of five or six thousand miles, is a joyous extension of sights and scenes of great interest to them.

On the top of the tallest tree in a pine grove, a little southwest of Moukden station, and across an expanse of a score or more of busy side tracks, was to be seen the banner of the Red Cross Society. Here were two camps of Red Cross field hospitals, one of which was under the control of Russian Red Cross authorities; the other under that of the Dutch Reformed Church of St. Petersburg. At these camps I was a welcome visitor. Many sick and wounded soldiers were here receiving some of the hospitalities of home, their number constantly increasing by fresh arrivals from the battle-fields of Liao-Yang. The Red Cross was fully equipped for active field work, being supplied with medical and surgical supplies, horses, mules, and ambulances, with baggage wagons and cars for transporting their tents and camp appliances. Wherever the army goes to battle, the camp of the field hospitals follows in its wake, to care for the sick and wounded. Similar work of the Red Cross Society was observed in connection with the Japanese army.

Some of the Red Cross trains are very elegantly equipped. The cars are of pure white, with a single red cross on the side, and within them is to be found every provision for the comfort of unfortunate officers and soldiers, including a place of public worship, and a spiritual adviser in the person of a priest of the established church. To be sick or wounded in such a place would almost seem a luxury. Russia is not sufficiently provided with cars of this description to meet all the exigencies of the present war, and so she has in hospital service third-class cars, and even box cars of the same kind as those employed in transporting the rest and file of her soldiery.

Directly to the west of the railway station, and north of the Red Cross camps, were located a long line of huge ovens, in which the Russians baked their loaves of rye and barley bread. Close by were stock yards, into which were being gathered great

The whole landscape to the south, was filled with the camps of soldiers. Stretching away beyond the horizon, were vast hosts of Russian cavalry, infantry and artillery. I visited these camps, and saw the soldiers in their tents and on duty. These forces were rapidly increasing every day by the addition of fresh troops from Siberia and European Russia. With special care, I noted the train arrivals for more than a week. On an average, there were twelve trains every twenty-four hours, two-thirds of which were loaded with soldiers; other trains were bringing horses, provisions and the munitions of war, with perhaps, a daily arrival of a Red Cross train. On each of these eight trains, were from three to five hundred soldiers, making a daily arrival at Moukden of 3,000 to 4,000 men. From personal observation, which extended all along the Trans-Siberian Railroad, from Moukden to St. Petersburg, I should judge Russia to have been transporting to the seat of war from 70,000 to 100,000 soldiers per month. The Russian forces under Kouropatkin, in the vicinity of Moukden at the present time, number about 300,000 men, Oyama's forces opposing him being of equal strength. A Russian umbers of horses, mules and cattle for the use of the army. Northwest of the railway station, and bordering along the side tracks, were numerous storehouses filled and overflowing with accumulated army supplies. Even tarpaulin covers had been brought into requisition for the protection of unhooused goods. Still further to the northwest of the station were the sand-pits used for

IN THE NATIVE QUARTER OF HARBIN

I met several war correspondents for American and European papers. More liberty is granted correspondents in the Russian lines than is granted them in the Japanese lines.

All letters and postal cards that I mailed, before forwarding were read by Captain Alfred Therimin, the Russian censor. He told me that he detained none of my correspondence.

Baron Hoven, a Russian, speaking good English, who lives in Moukden, requested me to call on him for any information or service I might need.

Such a large number of officers understand German, but no English, that most of my conversation with them was in German.

My journey from Moukden to Harbin, though a distance of only 300 miles, occupied five days. All trains bound for the seat of war having the right of way, our train was side-tracked more hours than it traveled. The railway stations through Manchuria, together with requisite buildings for operatives, are constructed of stone or brick on substantially the same pattern. At every railway bridge and culvert throughout Manchuria, a guard is stationed to protect it from injury or destruction by Japanese spies, or bands of Chinese brigands, called Hunghoozas. The Japanese have made many desperate efforts to destroy bridges of the Trans-Siberian railroad, and some have been caught in the attempt and executed. At frequent intervals, where guards have been stationed, signal posts have been erected, which, being some twenty feet in height, are wrapped with straw and topped with a can of petroleum. When an enemy approaches, a wire is used to release the oil, which flows down upon and saturates the straw. This, then, is ignited, producing great flames and giving the signal for assistance to military posts for miles along the line.

The regular stations all along the Trans-Siberian Railway were originally built at intervals of from six to ten miles. In order to facilitate the train service for the war, sub-stations between the original ones are now being rapidly established along the whole extent of the road, thus giving it an efficiency approaching a double track line.

Harbin, especially its newer portion, which is on the stand on the platform—a remark, however, which holds true for all the large railway bridges in Manchuria.

The Russo-Chinese Bank is an important financial institution of Harbin. On account of the great crowd of its customers I was much delayed in transacting a little business there. This is but one of a large number of banks operated by the same corporation and grading the road-bed and the laying of side tracks. Just northeast of the station is a Chinese village, which is greatly prospering on account of its extensive trade with the army.

On Sunday morning, I very clearly heard the soul-inspiring singing of the grand religious service of the Russians in one of the nearby camps, and I proceeded to the spot and united with them. A bishop and his assistant priest, wearing robes trimmed in purple and gold, stood on reed matting before a table spread with black velvet, on which rested the Holy Bible, the Sacred Icon, the censor and the great Golden Cross. Every man, near and far, with uncovered head, crossed himself and prayed. No other peoples are so religious as the Russians.

Revs. J. W. Inglis and H. W. Pullar, the Scotch missionaries stationed at Moukden, told me of their spiritual work among the natives. All church property was destroyed during the Boxer uprising in 1900. They preferred that the Japanese should occupy Moukden, and they also explained the religious, social, educational and political condition of the people. Rev. John Ross, D.D., who founded the mission thirty years ago, just before the Russo-Japanese War broke out, went on a short visit to Tientsin, and the Russians have not yet consented to his return to Moukden. In the opinion of the missionaries, the Japanese will soon drive the Russians entirely out of Manchuria. In this, however, I think they are greatly mistaken. Still, missionaries, as a rule, are the best source of information to be gathered in the countries where they labor.

When it rains, the black, sticky soil becomes a slough of despond. Frequently Chinese carts are stalled in the middle of the muddy street. I have seen whole batteries of heavy cannon stuck in the mud when six or eight horses were hitched to each piece.

Generally the Russians are patient with the Chinese, and treat them well; but occasionally a Chinaman is struck with the fist or butt of a revolver, and severely hurt. Russian policemen arrest the offending officer or soldier, as the case may be; but of several cases that came under my observation, little or no punishment was inflicted, even when the injured Chinaman died.

The Chinese courts often employ the death sentence in the case of murder, robbery and larceny, and executions are witnessed nearly every day, especially on Sunday, just outside the west gate. The big Chinese executioner, with a long, heavy, keen broadsword, severs the head of the kneeling culprit clean from the body with one stroke. In this manner, two, three or more are dispatched so quickly, that the gaping crowd scarcely realize what has been done. Usually the bodies are heedlessly left for devouring dogs and swine.

BURYING THE DEAD AFTER A FIGHT IN THE TRENCHES SOUTH OF MOUKDEN

high ground east of the railway station, unlike other cities of Manchuria, Dalny excepted, is a typical modern Russian city. The older part of Harbin, which is down on the banks of the Sungari River, has a mixed population, consisting of Chinese and of different nationalities of Europe. Besides being the junction of the two branches of the Trans-Siberian Railroad, one extending about 500 miles to Vladivostok, the other some 500 miles to Port Arthur, Harbin is the distributing centre of an important river commerce, carried on by steamers along the Sungari to Khabarovsk, thence by the Amur to the Pacific.

The great eight-span steel bridge across the Sungari at Harbin is truly an important achievement of modern engineering. It is guarded at both ends by detachments of soldiers and no one is allowed to approach it. Even when trains are crossing it, all the doors and windows of the cars are closed, and no one is permitted to under the same name in Moukden, New Chwang, Peking, Dalny, Port Arthur, Vladivostok, Khabarovsk, Blagoveshchensk, Stretensk, Chita, Irkutsk, and other important cities.

Harbin is also an important military headquarters. It is the leading centre for hospital service in all Manchuria. Trains are constantly bringing disabled soldiers here from the front. War prices prevail here as elsewhere in Manchuria and Siberia. A large new railway station, splendid office and business blocks, new residences and churches are in process of construction. The location and surroundings, the improvements and business of Harbin, indicate that the city will become metropolitan and influential.

Space forbids mentioning the many interesting experiences of my journey of more than six thousand miles from Harbin to St. Petersburg. I noticed stupendous improvements being made on the Trans-Siberian railroad—straightening the track, ballasting the road-bed, putting in new bridges, erecting sub-stations, introducing new and more powerful locomotives, operating the newly completed road around the south end of Lake Baikal, and laying a double track over the Ural Mountains. I saw vast fields of grain and thousands of herds of cattle, horses, mules and sheep grazing upon the ample acres of Siberia and European Russia. Russia's great cities are prosperous, and her country is filled with plenty.

From personal observation in both countries and with both armies, I am satisfied that the resources and wealth of Russia and her ability to carry on war for a long period of time, when compared with the resources of Japan, are immensely in favor of the empire of the Czar.

Notes of the War

The Russian Baltic fleet on Nov. 16 passed through the Suez Canal on its way East.

A "deadlock" has occurred between Great Britain and Russia on the North Sea incident. It is said that the Russian Ministry of Marine absolutely repudiates Lord Lansdowne's recent declaration that Russia had consented that the officers responsible for firing on the trawlers should be punished.

The Russian torpedo-boat destroyer, Razdorophny, escaped from Port Arthur on Nov. 15 during a blinding snowstorm, and, despite the Japanese naval blockade, succeeded in reaching Chefoo. It is believed her commander brought important dispatches from Gen. Stoessel to the Czar, one version being that the General desired permission to surrender the fortress. Russia denies this.

The Value of Trouble

THE life that is breathed into us by God's Spirit has ever to do an up-hill work. It has to grow against the gravitation of sin. It has to exert itself against the weariness of the flesh and the heaviness of the soul, sometimes oppressed by weights that are invisible to human eyes. It has to push up, like Sisyphus, the stone of endeavor to the top of the hill, notwithstanding that it rolls down again and again. But if we are rooted in the Divine love, if we are abiding in Christ, our spiritual life will grow, and in the end will overcome all that opposes and all that oppresses it.

John Spreull, of Glasgow, who for his defense of religious liberty in the times of Claverhouse, was imprisoned on the Bass Rock in the Firth of Forth, had a singular coat-of-arms. It consisted of a palm tree with two weights hanging from its branches, one on either side, and yet, in spite of the heavy down-dragging force, maintaining its upright position, carrying its graceful crown of foliage up into the serene air. And on the crest was inscribed the motto, Sub pondere cresco—"I grow under a weight."

That is the law of the world, and not less of our spiritual life. It is the great mystery of Providence that there should be such a vast amount of painful burden-bearing in the world, and much of it without apparent cause in the character of the sufferers. But if we are really Christians, no trouble, no sorrow of heart, shall destroy us, no weight shall crush us. On the contrary, what a beauty and grace have we often seen the spiritual life take on under the pressure of these "light afflictions which are but for a moment."

It is said that the capital of the Corinthian column, the loveliest of all the styles of architecture, derived its origin from a basket of offerings placed upon a child's grave, and covered with a tile to protect it from the birds. The basket chanced to stand upon the root of an acanthus, a species of thistle, and the plant grew and spread its leaves around it in so graceful a manner that it suggested to a passing artist the form of the Corinthian capital.

Even so the pressure of earth's troubles causes the spiritual life to develop around them its fairest forms, and the thorny sorrow that springs from the grave of some dead love or hope becomes the richest adornment of the soul.

Hopeful Signs in Russia

IF the news from St. Petersburg, that Prince Sviatopolk-Mirsky, the new Minister of the Interior, has succeeded in securing the Czar's personal support for his proposed reforms—particularly with relation to the re-establishment of the Zemstvos, or provincial assemblies—should prove to be well founded, it may result in a substantial improvement in the internal affairs of the empire. Prince Mirsky represents that very numerous element among the Russian people, which, while it is intensely patriotic and loyal to Emperor Nicholas and the highest interests of the nation, is relentlessly opposed to the bureaucracy, whose ruinous control has involved Russia in most of its recent troubles, including the war with Japan.

Previous to the appointment of the new Minister, and at a time when the Grand-Ducal influence in St. Petersburg was paramount, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (on October 5) pointed out the urgent necessity of various reforms, as a means of averting internal disorders in Russia, which threatened more serious disaster even than a defeat in the Far East. One of these reforms was the restoration of the authority of the Zemstvos. One of the first official acts of the new Minister was to plead with Emperor Nicholas to consent to a Conference of the Zemstvos, and this was granted, as the cable dispatches announce, in the face of a storm of opposition by the bureaucrats, who doubtless pictured to the Czar the prospective terrors of a Constitution, and all the evils that would arise from giving the people a voice in public affairs.

Under able leadership, the Zemstvos conference will no doubt proceed on conservative lines. Its aim will be to arrange for national co-operation among the provincial governments throughout Russia, with the ultimate prospect of the elective principle being applied in the choice of future assemblages, instead of the representatives being appointed by the Minister of the Interior. This is a decided step in the direction of political progress, and will afford more gratification to the Czar's subjects—the student, merchant, agriculturist, and working classes, as well as the smaller landholders—than any reform conceded by the Crown in recent years, as it will do away with the present oppressive and intolerable method of irresponsible administration, and will permit the people to conduct their own local and provincial affairs. It assures a reasonable measure of local self-government, and release from that petty official tyranny which has been the curse of Russia.

The Lesson of Atlanta

A LESSON for Christians throughout the country, is contained in the story of the remarkable movement in Atlanta, Ga., told on another page. The origin of the work is traced back to the meetings of a number of believers, which were held informally, but definitely, to pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The need for a revival was distinctly felt, and the plea was presented to the "Giver of every good and perfect gift." Prayer was continued until a conviction came into the hearts of these waiting people that the answer was assured. Then the help of the evangelists was sought. The preaching began in appeals to the church members, for a purging and purifying of their own lives and a seeking for the revival of spiritual life in their own souls. This was the method pursued and the blessing came.

What are we to learn from these facts? Is it possible that there is a deeper meaning than we have hitherto realized, in St. Paul's reference to "The Law of the Spirit of Life"? Is there a method by which the blessing of a revival may be obtained? Perhaps we have misapprehended Christ's remark about the Holy Spirit being like "the wind that bloweth where it listeth," and have concluded that there was an element of caprice in spiritual operations. Certain it is that the best efforts to produce an artificial revival, have oftentimes ignominiously failed. Earnest evangelists have labored, committees have been organized, a city has been distracted, and no commensurate result has been obtained. Our scientific achievements have been reached by adapting our plans to Nature's laws, which are God's laws. Is it possible that in the spiritual world there may also be a law, which is just as sure and regular in results? It is, at any rate, worth testing.

Is there need for revival in any city? Alas, where is the city in which that need does not exist? How many Christians are there in that city who earnestly desire a revival and have faith in God and prayer? Let them meet together, regardless of denominational differences, to entreat God to revive his work among them. At the same time, let each one look to his own personal life, and see if there is aught in it that is inconsistent with his prayer. Let there be an earnest seeking for more light and a more definite consecration. Who can tell if the answer may not be a blessing beyond conception? "Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

Letter Missions

CHRISTMAS letter missions are among the sweetest and most delicate expressions of altruism at this season of the year. By means of these missions, letters are sent broadcast to those who are likely to be overlooked and forgotten in the general gladness of Christmas. The forlorn and lonely people shut up in prisons, the chronic invalid chained to a couch or a chair, the sailor ashore far from his loved ones, and any others who are in danger of being omitted and left out are those who receive Christmas letters.

Why should not each of us do a little of this missionary work without sending it through the medium of any organization? Looking over our list of friends and acquaintances, there are surely some who are stranded by circumstances or desolate by reason of bereavement in their homes. To all such, a letter from a friend may come as a pleasant surprise. Once in a while, as you sit in the twilight, there comes to our minds a thought of some acquaintance of whom we have seen little, may be for years. Long ago, this friend moved away from the place where we lived and made a home elsewhere. We would have said, until we definitely remembered, that it was three or four years since the change. It is ten or fifteen years, and in that time he much has occurred to change life for us both! Sit down while the mood lasts, and write a love letter to the old friend, filling it with Christmas joy and good will.

Perhaps there is somebody against whom you have harbored resentment. Christmas is a time to do away with feuds and vindictiveness. Send a Christmas letter to the one who offended you, and you will probably meet more than half way. So will the Christmas peace dove-like, brood in your heart.

A Spiritual Bond

IT is a well-known fact that on various sea-coasts, the encroachment of the sea upon the land has been prevented by means of plants specially adapted to the purpose. These plants belong mostly to the grass tribe, though sometimes to the higher orders, and all possess the peculiarity of underground creeping stems, which rooting themselves at frequent intervals, and sending fresh shoots at every joint, all linked together, are enabled to offer an effectual resistance to the storm. The enormous dykes which the people have constructed in Holland, to keep out the inundations of the German Ocean, owe their stability to such plants, and it is said that along the low eastern coast of England, where the sea is continually seeking to encroach upon the shore, large quantity of land has in this way been reclaimed from the waters.

It is the social habits of these seaside plants that gives them their wonderful tenacity of life, and so admirably adapts them for the conditions in which they grow. Each separate plant is weak and fragile; left to itself it would quickly be uprooted and swept away by the fury of the tide. But when linked and interlaced in the closest fashion with the whole mass of similar plant life growing around, it can hold its own against the strongest forces of the ocean.

What we have to do as Christians in this world is like the work of the seaside plants. To prevent the encroachments of error, to beat back the waves of evil, to resist the storms of temptation, to win new additions to the kingdom of righteousness and peace, this is the work given us to do on earth. And we can do this in the high spiritual realm only as the grass by the seaside does its task in the lower realm of physical nature through the power of association; by realizing the vital bond by which Christians are members one of another, tied together in Christ Jesus, and made, however numerous and widely scattered, one body in the Lord.

Thousand-Year-Old Barge

AN interesting relic of bygone days has just been discovered in Norway. At Slagen, on the western side of Christiania Bay, an excavation was being made, when suddenly the laborers removing the sand and debris, came upon a strange craft. Its position showed that it must have been buried there for a long period. Perhaps it was carried ashore by some fierce storm, and became a wreck. Perhaps in those far-distant days the sea rolled over the place which is now dry land. The historians will have to explain how a vessel could be found there. As the vessel was uncovered, the interest in it increased. It was evidently a state barge. Its fine woodwork, its delicate carving, the beauty of its prow, the graceful turning of its rails, all showed that it had been intended for occasions of ceremony. When the sand and debris were all removed, another discovery was made. It clearly had belonged to a woman, for among the rubbish that had accumulated in and around it, there was a loom, and a beautiful sledge, such as no man would be likely to use. Another indication of feminine ownership was the fact that in no part of it were there any of the weapons that are generally found on ancient ships. The opinion is formed from all the indications, that this is an ancient pleasure barge which some powerful and wealthy Viking monarch provided for his queen. Who she was, and who was the husband who thus proved his devotion to her, and sought to provide for her enjoyment, no one can now tell. The relic is there as the mute evidence of his affection, and of the luxury with which he delighted to surround her. A thousand years have gone by since those fierce old Vikings, who roamed over the northern seas, and, it is believed, penetrated even to the shores of America, lived, and ruled, and fought their battles by land and sea. The record of their valor and their conquests is imperishable, but there is another side of their character. In this luxurious barge, unearthed at this late day, we have evidence of the softer side of their nature, showing the tender affection that lavished on some fair queen all the gentle attention foreign to the characteristics we have learned to associate with them. It is singular that this relic, that has withstood the passage of time, should not be of the stronger vessels in which they went forth to ravage the shores of their enemies, but should be a memorial of love and kindness. Love beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never faileth (I. Cor. 13: 7, 8).

Long-Distance Telegram

The novel experience of sending a message around the world to reach Chicago from New York was one of the results of the storm on November 13. The New York manager of the Postal Telegraph Company discovered, on Sunday evening, that the entire service was crippled in the West, South and Northeastern routes. Frantic efforts were made to ascertain the nature and extent of the damage, but messages sent out disappeared in blank space. No communication, even by roundabout routes, could reach Chicago. In despair, the manager determined to cable around the world. He sent a message East, which traveled over the 25,000 miles, inquiring what were the telegraphic conditions east of Chicago. In about an hour the desired information came back, that Chicago was in communication as far east as Harrisburg, Pa. The message went by way of London, Gibraltar, Alexandria, Aden, Bombay, Madras, Hong-kong, Guam, Manila, San Francisco and Chicago. Under normal conditions the message might have been sent over its thousand mile journey by hundreds of direct and indirect routes, but on that day it had to pass under three oceans and traverse four continents. Happily for all who are seeking God, the way is always open, and no storm can separate them from his ear.

It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us and bring it unto us; neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us. But the word is very nigh unto thee (Deut. 30: 12-14).

Luminous Bodies

Experiments have been made by Dr. Hooker, an authority on radium, on a new discovery. He says that the human body gives out rays, which differ from the X-rays, but are of the same species. He characterizes handled, and the paper on which he writes, so that his character may be known from them, what must be the effect on the men with whom he comes in contact? There may be a more profound meaning than we supposed in the statement of the Apostle:

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself (Rom. 14: 7).

Held in a Quagmire

A mystery, supposed to be supernatural, which had disturbed a Long Island village for three days and nights, has been solved by a tragical discovery. Nightly, soon after sunset, the people of Maspeth, N. Y., heard cries and groans proceeding from a swamp of considerable extent near the village. In the daytime the noises of the village drowned the strange noise, but in the silence of the night people passing near the swamp were frightened by them. Search was made around the edge of the swamp, but no sign of a living person could be seen. It was known to be dangerous to penetrate into the interior, for the gases from it are injurious to health and there are stories of quicksands which would swallow a horse or a cow. One man, however, was so distressed by the groans that he took his dog and made a search. The dog traced the noise to an overhanging tree. The man procured some boards and went to the place. There he found a man with his head and shoulders above ground, holding a branch of the tree. He secured assistance and the man was drawn out. He was so weak from hunger that he could scarcely speak. He said he had tried to cross the swamp in the dark, three days before, but had sunk in the sand. He had held himself up by the branch of the tree since that time. He had been afraid to go to sleep, lest he let go his hold and sink in the sand. He was sent to the hospital, but his exposure had been too much for him, and he died. What misery the man must have endured during the long hours of the three days and nights of his helpless suspension, while the cruel sand was dragging him down to death, and he was holding to the tree! It is like the struggle that some men are making, who, while longing to live a life for God, are dragged down by their slavery to some besetting sin. But unlike this man, they might be delivered if they would cry to Him, who is mighty to save.

Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins (Matt. 1: 21).

BRIEF NOTES

The Bible Society of New York (not the American Bible Society) distributed last year 71,426 volumes of the Scriptures in thirty languages. Of these 42,408 went to the immigrants on Ellis Island.

It is reported that Dr. Cochrane, the famous medical missionary in Persia, has been murdered. It is believed that the bandits who murdered Rev. B. Labaree recently, mistook him for Dr. Cochrane.

Miss Mary Wilkinson, who has died at Accrington, England, recently, at the age of eighty-four, had for sixty-five years never missed teaching a class on Sundays, with the exception of the Sunday before her death, and was never once late.

Dr. John Paton is paying another visit to Sydney. The work on the New Hebrides, he says, was never more satisfactory than now. The whole Bible has been translated into the native language, and part has been translated into twenty-four other languages and dialects.

The parish of Trinity in New York, with its various branches, has taken a decided attitude on the divorce question. The clergy men of those churches will in future refuse to conduct the marriage service in any case in which one of the parties has a husband or wife still living. Even the innocent party to a divorce suit is barred by this rule. Thus the injured person is punished for being sinned against.

them as N-rays. The physician, in a letter to a medical journal, declares that they are of several colors, and that these colors indicate the character of the person. "Rays emanating from a very passionate man," says Dr. Hooker, "have a deep red hue. One whose keynote in life is to be good and to do good, throws off pink rays; an ambitious man emits orange rays; a deep thinker throws off deep blue; an anxious, depressed person, gray; one who leads a low, debased life, muddy brown rays; and a physically or mentally ill person, dark green rays." Dr. Hooker admits that his statement may be received at first, with a smile of incredulity, but he is confident it will sooner or later be accepted as a fact. He further says he has proved that N-rays are not only given off by the human body, but by objects which have been in contact therewith. He obtained this impression from a letter thirty years old, which proved that the rays are radioactive, and retain their power on the paper on which writing is made. This is a startling discovery. If the emanations from a man's body leave their impress on the articles he has

MRS. RODNEY looked puzzled. "What! What!" she exclaimed loudly. Then, bewildered, she turned to the Judge and Miss Mildred in turn. "What did he say?" she exclaimed in a whisper to the Judge. Judge Rodney did not reply, but continued to listen grimly as Stanton went on.

"For twenty-five years, Brother Lee, and brethren, I have been preaching half a Gospel, hiding in my own heart that which was the vital truth to me. I was born into the established order of a wealthy, favored class of social prominence. I entered the pulpit with this inherited, inborn, and educated habit of mind. As the years of my ministry have gone on I have been irresistibly led, however, to believe that the Gospel fully understood demands a new and different order of social life from that which the Church has all these years been teaching. Ten years ago this conviction had grown so strong in me that I was impelled to write the story called The Christian Socialist, and, I repeat it, that book contains my heart beliefs, the vital Gospel truths which I ought to have preached from the pulpit, but which I did not preach because of my cowardice. I knew this Church would reject me and my teachings. I was, I confess it freely, too much in love with the social position I held in Saint Cecilia to be willing to exchange it for the ostracism and the misunderstanding I should henceforth know. But, Brother Lee, brethren, friends, all, do not have any compassion or even contempt for me. To-day, for the first time, I speak as a free man. The teachings in the book I most firmly believe are Gospel truths. I am not and would not be an enemy of human advancement. I love the Church even though I anticipate its necessary action in my own case. To relieve her of any possible embarrassment, I here and now resign my position as one of her ministers, I lay down this high office just conferred, I step voluntarily into the ranks of the people; and if at any time I am called to assume the sacred office of a minister of Christ and give my message through the pulpit, I will gladly do so if I am called by God and my brethren. Meanwhile, I shall privately and publicly espouse the cause as I have declared it in my own book, for it contains my very life. We have already entered upon a history of the race which nothing can set back. The social movement cannot be stopped. The Church is powerless, society is powerless, to stay this last unfolding of the teaching of the Golden Rule and the Sermon on the Mount."

He gravely and with great dignity bowed to the venerable Bishop, to the assembled clergy on the platform, and then to the congregation, and turning, he walked with head erect from the platform and into the pastor's room at the side. As the door closed, a wave of astonished whispering swept over the assembly. Bishop Lee, after a moment of stunned embarrassment, turned to the congregation.

"This service is over," he said briefly, and turned to his brethren on the platform. Judge Rodney and wife and daughter rose, and were among the first to pass out in stern and astonished silence.

That evening, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton made his last parish call as pastor of Saint Cecilia. Throughout that afternoon he had been holding conference with several of his brethren in the ministry. There was nothing, however, for him to do but what was inevitable. His brethren conceded that, after a fruitless conference, and withdrew finally.

When the servant took in the Rev. Fredrick Stanton's card to Mrs. Rodney she turned red, then pale, and handed the card to the Judge.

"Tell him we are not at home," she said sharply. The Judge turned a little uneasily in his chair, but said nothing.

The servant went out. Presently he came back and said apologetically: "Dr Stanton wishes to see Miss Rodney."

Miss Mildred sat still, and her mother eyed her sternly.

"Tell Mr. Stanton Miss Mildred is not at home."

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

Miss Mildred rose and faced her mother.

"I am going down to see him," she said.

The Judge shrugged his shoulders. Mrs. Rodney struck the table with her jeweled fingers.

"I forbid it! You shall not see that man!"

"Nevertheless, mother, I am going, for—for—I—"

"If you disobey me, you know what—"

Mrs. Rodney did not finish. Miss Mildred said simply: "If he asks me to marry him, I shall become his wife. Father"—she suddenly turned and kneeled by the Judge—"I love him!" She hid her face on his breast as she used to do when a child, and the Judge kissed her, but did not say anything. Suddenly the proud Mildred rose and walked out of the room before her mother could utter another word.

In the parlor the Rev. Fredrick Stanton turned to face a self-possessed woman, who asked him to be seated, as if, forsooth, he were some indifferent caller.

"I have come," he said abruptly, "to say good-by. Of course I am aware that what has been done to-day finishes my life here, but it cannot finish my memories of life, and—"

"What are you planning to do, Dr. Stanton, if I may ask?"

"I do not yet know. The platform is free to me. Out in the world the people whom I have loved are calling me with their myriad voices of appeal. But all this is of no interest to you. Will you allow me to say, however, since it will not harm you, I have loved you these years of my cowardice, and I know it has been a noble thing for it has ennobled me. In parting from you I leave the best I have known."

Then Miss Mildred said something that astonished "Mark Burns."

"Did you not say once, Dr. Stanton, that I was like the character of Janet Arnold in The Christian Socialist?"

"I did. You sat for that portrait; it was my joy to have your presence with me while writing the story."

"Then do you still think I would do as Janet Arnold did, and forgive and—and forget—her lover's cowardice on account of—on account of—"

The minister had risen, and had come over to where Miss Mildred was sitting.

"Because she loved him so? Oh, Mildred—do you mean—you love—"

"I will do as Janet Arnold did—if there is a place in your Christian Socialism for me."

"The first place of all," said the Rev. Fredrick Stanton, as he kneeled and laid his proud head upon her lap.

"No," she said after a moment, while the happy tears fell over her face—"No, you should not kneel to me. I believe in you wholly. I believe in your heart beliefs. I have grown to believe since I read your book, 'Mark Burns.'"

"Did you suspect the authorship?" he asked, a few moments later.

"I knew it all along," she said laughingly. "I was the only person in the parish of Saint Cecilia that knew. Have I not kept it well? I wanted to be a coward with you."

"But now," he asked, a little troubled, as he gazed into the clear gray eyes: "Now, can you follow me in the stormy life that is inevitable? Can you bear all this—cast in your lot with mine; with the people, and enter the new world we may help to make, as my wife, as my companion, my very self?"

She raised her face to his and let him kiss her for the first time. "Yea," she answered. "Whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried, the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

"But you have sacrificed much," she added.

"Nay, my beloved," he answered with a glorified smile, "I have gained far more than a bishopric, since I have both thee and a free conscience with which to face the wide world."

"But will the world accept your message, Fredrick?" she asked after a moment.

"It remains to be seen," he answered slowly. "It has been the dream of my soul these ten years now, that the common people were ready for the message of Jesus to the social life of men."

"And if the time has not yet come, what then?" she asked, smiling up at him in boundless faith and love.

"Then let me be true to my message. Woe is mine if I preach not this Gospel of a social Christ to men."

"Woe to me also," she whispered. He realized in some degree the crisis for them both. And as he bent and kissed her as she looked up at him unquestioning his strength and dauntless of any evil in the future, he prayed his prayer—"Grant, Lord, for both of us the peace, as we face together the needs and sorrows and wants and sins and yearnings and hopes and possibilities of the great wide world, that needs more than anything else the daily presence in its social life of Jesus Christ the Carpenter, the Son of God and the Son of man."

CHAPTER II

EXTRACT from the Lenox Daily Times the morning after the scene in Saint Cecilia, where the Rev. Fredrick Stanton revealed his authorship of the book called The Christian Socialist:

"The result of the Rev. Mr. Stanton's action will be watched with the greatest interest. In reality what he has done is a challenge to the Church in general. There are churches in America, no doubt, where the author of The Christian Socialist could remain and teach his doctrines from the pulpit, but Saint Cecilia is not one of them, and the astonishing charge of Bishop Lee at the close of the regular charge to the candidate yesterday, may be taken as the utterance of the conservative wing of the Church in general. The public will be more than interested to know what the famous author of The Christian Socialist will do now. The Times is frank to say it does not believe at all in the implied teachings of that really remarkable book. To our mind, the Rev. Mr. Stanton has simply stirred up unnecessary trouble by his book, and by the extraordinary action which he took yesterday. Some of the reforms which he outlined in his story are already proved to be impossible in human experience. Others are open to very grave question. The world is not prepared for such radical changes in its social programme. There are some mighty pretty theories, Brother Stanton, that don't work at all when you try to apply them to the kind of humanity that actually exists; until the world has a different race of beings out of whom to fashion society, do business, and make politics, the schemes of The Christian Socialist will be simply visionary and impracticable. We are of the opinion that the Rev. Fredrick Stanton has lost a good job and will find it extremely difficult to secure another."

One week later, the Lenox Times contained the announcement of the marriage of "Miss Mildred Rodney daughter of Judge Royal Rodney, of the District Court to Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., author of The Christian Socialist, and late Pastor of Saint Cecilia Church." The Times went on in a column-long "story" to unfold this latest news.

"This latest phase of the Stanton sensation is in keeping with the entire astounding affair. The wedding of Dr. Stanton and Miss Rodney was performed at the Rodney residence, with the family only as witnesses. Judge Rodney is said to be reconciled to the match, but rumor has it that Mrs. Rodney was present only as a matter of form and to avoid the comments of society. There is a story going the rounds that she refused to speak to her new son-in-law at the conclusion of the ceremony. Dr. Stanton certainly made his wooing short, and is to be congratulated on having won a most thoroughly accomplished and charming wife. When seen by a Times reporter this evening he would not state what his future plans would be."

"What do you think of that?" Fredrick Stanton looked his wife. He had been reading the newspaper aloud. She that was once the proud daughter of a proud and exclusive family, looked at her husband out of eyes that revealed a nature transformed by a redeeming love which makes all miracles possible.

"I think about it just as you do," she said with a smile.

"If that is going to be your habit, won't it make matters a little monotonous between us?"

"Do you want me to quarrel with you?"

"Once in a while, 'Janet,' I think it would be advisable."

"Then I say I shall never do it."

"But you are now."

"Then I say I will never do it again, my love."

"Mildred, do you realize that the newspapers consider us good for copy from now on?"

"It does not trouble me any."

"Not even if they describe in detail our wall-paper and our eating habits at the table?"

"I shall be too busy to read them. Besides, have you not learned yet, dear man, that I am perfectly satisfied, and care naught for what all the world says, knowing you as I do?"

"Thank God," said the minister to himself gently.

There is no doubt in her dear mind,

'Tis heaven born and heaven kind.

"Mildred, I wish your mother liked me better."

"She likes you better than you imagine. Mother is not implacable. But of course she does not understand you. For that matter, she does not understand me."

"But your father?"

"He has studied these things. I think his heart he believes some of your doctrines. The rest of it is unknown territory, and father is cautiously conservative."

"You are not sorry you married me?"

"I shall be if you ever ask that question again."

"Pardon, dear woman. I have not yet become accustomed to the great fact that Mildred Rodney is my wife. I am still dreaming."

"Is it a pleasant dream?"

"It is heaven for me."

"Please, then, do not wake up."

"When I do, the day-vision will be as beautiful. Mildred, you are sure of all this boundless faith in one poor, incomplete human?"

She came up and sat down on the arm of his chair and put her hand on his lips.

"Another word of that, sir, and I go home to my mother. Fredrick, a woman like me gives all, without reserve, when she gives. I am not perfect, and shall doubtless disappoint your ideals. But I love you, and believe in you to the last atom of my being. When I cease to do that I shall be dead."

He remembered that passionate outburst of his wife as long as he lived. It was framed in his memory in golden letters, where he saw it during many and many a crisis of trying events that passed this man and wife through the furnace of testing, where nothing but an inexhaustible love for each other could possibly have made the experiences bearable.

After a moment, she said:

"You are going down to speak to the strikers this evening?"

"Yes, they have invited me to their conference."

"Can I go, too?"

"I don't know," her husband answered hesitatingly. "Do you want to go?"

"Certainly I do, if it is allowable for me to come."

"I don't think Harvey will object. But the men may not like it. I understand they are getting to be ugly, and I am seriously apprehensive of real trouble."

"You would rather I wouldn't go?"

"On the whole, yes. It is an unnecessary risk."

"How about yourself, Fredrick?" Mildred spoke reproachfully.

"I don't believe there is any danger."

"But you just said there was."

"I said there was a risk."

"And you don't want me to take it, and you are going into it yourself. Is this your boasted woman equality before the law?"

"I am a man," he said simply. "Say what you will about woman's rights and all that, you know well enough, Mildred, I have never preached nor believed in my book or elsewhere, in any other vision of womanhood except that which my own mother enshrined in her own holy of holies. Woman may be entitled to all the legal and political and social rights of man, but the moment she ceases to feel the need of man's strength, and protection, and love as a companion, that moment she loses, what I believe is the divinest thing God gave her."

"Still, while all this is true, my lord, I do not want you to run any unnecessary risks with these strikers. Be careful, won't you, Fredrick? What should I do if anything were to happen to you?"

"Are you so dependent on me then, dear one?"

"You are all to me," she said, and the words sang in his heart as he went down to the place of the meeting that evening, the vision of his wife in all her loveliness rising in his soul into an almost painful ecstasy of feeling.

The Lenox strike had been in progress now for over eight months. The long brick row of mills down by the river were strangely silent. The machinery was rusting, cobwebs were visible over the closed windows.

"WHEN I SHALL CEASE TO DO THAT,"
SAID MILDRED, "I SHALL BE DEAD."

The cause of the strike was simplicity itself. The mill company had employed five non-union men one day. A committee from the Union had attempted to confer with the president. The spokesman of the committee had made the statement to the superintendent that it was contrary to the rules of the Union that non-union men should work in the mill. The superintendent had cut him short by saying the company had decided to employ any men who could do the work, regardless of the Union. The committee backed out of the office, and in less than an hour five thousand men walked out of the building, seven million dollars worth of capital was tied up, and a loss of several hundred thousand dollars a day to employers and employed had been begun, and continued through eight sullen, weary, wasteful, unchristian months.

That was the story of the great Lenox strike down to the evening when Fredrick Stanton had been invited by Bruce Harvey, the President of the Union, to speak at the meeting in the Hall, to the men, who for over half a year had been loafing about the streets and in the saloons of Lenox, doing nothing, earning nothing, all on account of what Stanton believed to be a foolish and useless difference of opinion concerning the best way to advance the cause of Labor's rights.

So far there had not been an act of violence. Harvey had his men well in hand. To-night, as Stanton went up on the platform and met the man there, he could read all sorts of things in his face and manner. The man had force of a certain, well-defined type. He was not educated, yet he knew better than most professors of political economy and sociology in the universities, the history and writings of the entire labor movement. He had saturated himself in the doctrines of Karl Marx, and could quote exactly and copiously from all the Socialistic writers, Blatchford, Hyndman, Jackoby, Kautsky, Tom Mann, Lasalle, Vandervelde, Engles, Simonds, Leibknecht, Ladoff, Bax, and William Morris, to say nothing of writers like Keir Hardie, J. Stitt Wilson, Max Hayes, "Mother" Jones and Ernest Crosby. He had a silent contempt for the preachers of Lenox, and considered the Church as a useless tag to a useless society, and ministers as a parasitic class that existed by sufferance, but could just as well be dispensed with for the good of the masses.

With all this true of him, Harvey had kindly and generous personal qualities that endeared him to the working men. He owed his rise to the place of President of the Union, not only to his knowledge of men and the labor movement, but to many acts of human brotherhood so numerous as to make him marked.

The Hall seated over two thousand men. It was a building owned and controlled by the Union. To-night it was jammed, aisles and gallery, with a restless, noisy mob of nearly three thousand. The street outside was packed with as many more people, and one of the Union leaders was haranguing the crowd there when Harvey introduced Stanton to the men inside.

Stanton came forward, and the men gave him a somewhat boisterous welcome. Most of them had read his book, and while the majority of them had no use for him as a minister, they considered him as an exception, and were ready, so Stanton thought, to give him a respectful hearing.

He began by expressing his gratification at the good order that had prevailed among the men during the progress of the strike, and then went on to make a frank statement concerning his opinions of the strike in general. He quoted three or four well-known labor leaders with telling effect, and the men were quiet, though Harvey, sitting there with his dark eyes sombre, and brows contracted, easily detected a mark of restless dissent from Stanton. Perhaps Stanton saw it too. If so, he gave no sign, but went on calmly to say just what he believed.

"President Harvey asked me to say what I believed is the remedy for the troubles that exist between Capital and Labor in this country. I'm not going to quote the statements made in the writings of most Socialist authors. You are familiar with them. There is, however, one great factor which I do not find mentioned by any of them, which, to my mind, is the greatest of all. The Great Workman of the ages mentioned it very many times in his talks with the multitude. Indeed, so far as I can discover, he made mention of no other remedy for human troubles of every description. That remedy was not bigger wages, fewer hours, more land, bigger houses, finer clothes, better food, but love to one another. That, according to Christ, is the greatest practical remedy for all the troubles of the world."

There was a profound silence over the hall. Stanton took a step forward. Before he could speak a dozen voices rose.

"This ain't no church," they cried. "We didn't come in here to listen to preaching!" "He's like all the rest o' the preachers!" "Harvey—Harvey!"

Stanton waited quietly until he could be heard. Then he said, coolly: "I'm not here to beg for a respectful audience. If you don't want to listen to me, you don't have to. I am not obliged to speak, and I don't intend to try to fight for a hearing with a crowd of men who have no sense. I can get one elsewhere."

He walked back to his chair and sat down. The crowd in the hall seemed smitten into a confused silence. Then there was a roar of laughter and cries of "Good for you!" "That's the stuff, preacher!" "Bully for you, speaker!" "Go on—go on!" Other voices, however, called out for Harvey. Stanton remained quietly seated. Harvey looked at him half angrily.

A Great Revival in Georgia

NEVER in the memory of this generation has such a sight been witnessed in Atlanta, Ga., as on November 2. The whole city gave itself up to prayer and praise. The Atlanta Constitution says that the sight was unprecedented. The stores, factories, and offices closed; the Supreme Court of Georgia adjourned; even the saloons and places of amusement united in the movement by shutting their doors. "It was a novel experience," says the Constitution, "to walk down Whitehall Street, Atlanta's busiest thoroughfare, and witness on a week day the closed stores, and the street deserted by pedestrians, all on account of a great religious movement in the city. It is a strong influence that will make men turn from pursuing the dollar to the pursuit of their soul's salvation, and surely the better, deeper nature of Atlanta has been touched when her people virtually turn a busy weekday into a Sabbath, and repair, almost as one man, from the scene of their daily toil and striving, to the house of prayer."

"Atlanta is bound to be the better for the present gracious season of spiritual quickening, and the beneficent results will by no means be confined to the church organizations. Such a religious revival not only greatly strengthens the churches in membership and zeal in the divine cause of the Master, but it strengthens the moral tone of the whole community, and results in untold spiritual good to lives that rarely, if ever, come under the direct influence of Gospel effort."

"The attendance at the many meetings being held in various parts of the city, was simply phenomenal. It seems as if all Atlanta turned out to hear the glad tidings, and it is evident that the impression made by the services is universal."

This day of prayer came as the culmination of a series of evangelistic services, which had been conducted for a month previous by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, Rev. Arthur J. Smith, and other evangelists. Some time before they began, a number of Christian business men had quietly met together to pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The little band gradually increased by the addition of lawyers, physicians, and bankers, until it became an assemblage of nearly a thousand. At the head of it, as he is of nearly every Christian work in the State, was ex-Governor Northen. The meetings were held regularly, and the burden of all the prayers was that God would revive his work. The conviction grew that these prayers would be answered, and an invitation was sent to Dr. Chapman to get together a corps of evangelists and come down. A definite promise was made to him, that the ministers of the city would give him loyal and cordial support.

The invitation was accepted. Rev. Daniel S. Toy, Rev. George Stuart, and Rev. Arthur J. Smith, accompanied Dr. Chapman and Messrs. Biederwolf and Walton, and with each a singer for solos. This was on Oct. 2, and at once work was begun simultaneously in five districts of the city. There was a noon service every day in the large First Baptist Church. This was primarily intended for Christian people with the object of quickening spiritual life; but outsiders came in such numbers that the opportunity could not be lost, and direct appeals were made to the unsaved, and there was scarcely a meeting at which there were no conversions. In the evening the meetings were crowded, and the Gospel was preached with intense earnestness and power.

Services were begun for men only. These became so large, that the Grand Opera House was used, and though that building accommodates 3,500 persons, it was thronged to its limits, and from one to two thousand persons were unable to gain admission. The results were marvelous. Men of every class, from the highest to the lowest, were moved. Judges, physicians and merchants have made profession of faith, some of them long prominent in the life of the city, and it was thronged before the hour for which it was called. At every meeting there were many inquirers, and many rose to declare themselves on the Lord's side. Besides these public services, in more than a hundred private houses prayer meetings the city. Among workingmen there was the same remarkable interest. Special services were asked for, and held in surface-car barns, in railroad-shops, in factories, and on the streets. Even in the hotels, the impulse was felt. A meeting for prayer was announced in the corridor of one of the largest hotels in were held daily, to which not only the friends of the hostess, but any one who would come was welcomed. A special work for children was conducted by Rev. C. T. Schaefer, at which fully a thousand children pledged themselves to Christ.

"I do not know of any place in the country," said Dr. Chapman, at the closing meeting on Nov. 6, "where the outlook is brighter for a sweeping work of greater than in this Southland. I have been sixteen years in evangelistic work, and think I ought to say, that never before have I witnessed a more remarkable manifestation of interest in spiritual things than I have here. I have never known ministers to stand by me more loyal and I have never had a more respectful and constant attention given to my messages."

Five thousand cards were signed, persons pledging themselves to Christ, indicating the churches with which they intended connecting themselves. They will be sorted and the pastors notified, that every convert will be looked after.

During the whole month it has been inspiration to witness the enthusiasm of Governor Northen, who has gone from one meeting to another, testifying an encouraging others. He said at the closing meeting: "Since these meetings began I have not given as much as ten hours to my personal affairs, but I have never rendered a service that made me happier. I'm tired—sometimes I have been very tired—but God knows I could stand another five weeks, and if at the end of the time I should die, I would thank God that he had given me the opportunity to witness in such a movement."

We most devoutly hope that Dr. Chapman's cheering prediction, uttered when he was leaving Atlanta, may be fulfilled. To a friend, to whom he was bidding farewell, he said: "I believe God has been with us with wonderful power. I truly believe that this revival here is but the beginning of great times in religion in the South. And if the South gets on fire with a season of religious awakening, it is sure to spread rapidly throughout the entire country. What a glorious prospect this is. Surely the time has come in our great land for another great fever of religion to sweep from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. I believe the movement here is the beginning of it."

Answered Prayers

E. A. M., Defiance, O. "I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a number of years, and have derived much help from it. I, too, am a firm believer in the answering of prayer, and know that God hears and answers."

Mrs. G. W., Onalaska, Wis. "I called upon the Lord in the day of trouble, and he heard my prayer. I promised God if he would help me I would confess it. I want to thank him by telling others that they may be strengthened as I have been."

D. P. K. "At one time I was in great bodily pain and promised, if relief came, I would acknowledge that God does hear and answer prayer. Relief came to me, but I have never added my testimony with others, as I ought to have done. God has often answered my prayers long before I expected an answer."

Miss T. M., Dexter, Mich. "These promises that God will answer prayer are very precious to me. Psalms 34: 6; 50: 15; 91: 15; 145: 19; Jeremiah 29: 12; Mark 7: 78; 21: 22; John 14: 13, 14. I praise God that has answered my prayers; and I know he will continue to answer if we believe when we ask, and patiently wait for the answer."

Mrs. H. B. S., Bedford City, Va. "I wish to add my testimony to 'Answered Prayers.' My only little boy lay at the point of death. The doctors said he would not live through the night. But I prayed and worked over him all night, and the dear Lord answered my prayer and spared my boy. I believe he answers the prayer of faith."

L. W. D., Norristown, Pa. "I wish in this public way to acknowledge God's goodness and faithfulness to men. All my life, from childhood, have been trusting Him, and in a marvelous way he has kept me, but recently he has given such direct answer I feel I cannot thank him enough, tell it wide enough. He surely cares for, and is interested in everything that concerns his children."

Fred P., Sedalia, Mo. "I desire to add my testimony to the increasing number of answers to prayer by a merciful father in heaven. When patient at the hospital for forty-five weeks, having been on the operating table twice, without a good result, and being informed by the surgeons of the necessity of a third operation, which might terminate my life or make me a cripple for life, I threw myself on my Saviour's mercy, implored his gracious interference, and immediately my wound began to heal, and I am a miracle of his healing power."

The People, the Land, and the Book

A Unique Quarterly Hebrew-Christian Magazine

WE have entered into a Special Combination Arrangement with The People, The Land, and The Book, which enables us to present to our readers the following proposition, which we feel confident will prove particularly attractive to Christian people generally, and particularly to all students of the Scriptures. The People, The Land, and The Book is a unique publication, and the only magazine of its kind in the world. It is illustrated, and issued quarterly—Four Times a Year.

The People, The Land, and The Book is replete with valuable information, shedding new light on the Bible and the wondrous story of the Chosen People from earliest times to the present day.

Its contributions show ripe scholarship, and are the work of the ablest living Hebrew and Christian authorities.

It is a rich storehouse of learning, and an invaluable equipment for the student and the Christian worker. The Rev. Dr. David Gregg writes: "I should like to see it in every home."

The People, The Land, and The Book presents to the Jew a correct idea of Christ, and to the Christian it reveals the Jew in a new aspect, and completely bridges the barrier that has been reared by ignorance and misconception, and which has separated the Jew from the rest of the world.

The Magazine is also a repository of the brightest productions in Jewish literature, in tradition, song and story, and revives for the reader the golden or heroic age of the Jew in all its glory and splendid traditions, as well as its future. Characteristic illustrations add greatly to the interest.

Its subscription price is $1.00 a year, that is $1.00 for four quarterly issues.

As stated above, the Annual Subscription Price of The People, The Land, and The Book is $1.00. The Scroll of the Law is 50 Cents. But our arrangement enables us to send this Quarterly ($1) and the Scroll of the Law (50 Cents) with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year ($1.50)—all together worth $3.00—for only $2.00. This Special Offer closes December 31, 1904, and no Combination Subscription for The People, The Land, and the Book, with The Scroll of the Law and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, can be filled unless your Subscription is mailed on or before December, 31, 1904.

Please bear in mind that the last day of the year 1904 terminates the above arrangement between THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and The People, The Land, and The Book. Therefore, if you would avail yourself of the offer, it would be well to do it at once. Unless when ordering you make particular mention of The Scroll of the Law, it will not be sent, as it is a Special Premium under this offer.

CONCERNING OURSELVES

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is issued every Wednesday, 52 times a year, and in that respect it differs from the monthly magazines, publishing only twelve issues a year.

Six Thousand Pages a Year

The pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are nearly four times as large as those of monthly magazines, and contain fully five times as much reading matter. Thus, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's 24 pages weekly equal at least 120 pages of the monthly magazine, aggregating over 6,000 ordinary magazine pages.

Uplifting and Optimistic

Its articles are always treated in a popular vein. Complex, abstruse, and involved contributions are simplified and rendered easily intelligible, or altogether excluded. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is never dull or stupid, but always bright, wide-awake, newsy, fresh and full of vitality. It is pre-eminently a cheerful home magazine, uplifting, encouraging, healthy, optimistic.

Beautifully Illustrated

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is more profusely illustrated than any other weekly family magazine. Its pictures, many printed in artistic colors, are exceedingly life-like and attractive.

Makes Sunday Cheerful

Then, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributes to make Sunday the happiest and brightest day of the week, with its exquisite stories, its beautiful pictures, its occasional puzzle department, and its one thousand-and-one other attractions, that must be actually enjoyed in order to be properly appreciated.

Delightful Surprises

Hereafter, as heretofore, it shall be our rule to make every issue abound in new features, and to make the 52 issues for 1905 one continuous succession of Literary and Artistic Surprises.

Kindly induce AT LEAST ONE of your friends to subscribe for The Christian Herald

What Is a Red-Letter Bible?

THE RED LETTER EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, SELF-PRONOUNCING, and unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch:

1 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are Printed in Red.

2 In the Old Testament, the passages printed in red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which He referred.

3 Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.

4 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

What it Contains

Our Red Letter Bible is SELF-PRONOUNCING, and Contains, in Addition to the Holy Scriptures, the CONCORDANCE, Subject-Index, Persons, Places and Things, Gazetteer, and Dictionary, all under ONE Alphabetical Arrangement, together with HELPS, MAPS, and Numerous Illustrations, and a Carefully Prepared SYNOPSIS OF THE BOOKS of the Bible, which furnishes a bird's-eye view of their contents.

Good Manners Are a Part of Good Morals

Good Manners For All Occasions

Margaret E. Sangster's Latest Volume

This is not an antiquated production, but was written in October, 1904, especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by Margaret E. Sangster, the leading and unquestioned authority on social etiquette.

Mrs. Sangster writes for the people, and consequently, "the plain people," as Abraham Lincoln was pleased to call them, can adopt, without doing violence to preconceived notions, the forms for correct manners which she here lays down in simple language.

There is no valid reason why the farmer and his sons should not be gentlemen, or why the artisan's wife and her daughters should not be ladies, so far as deportment is concerned, and surely there are none so wealthy or so learned, that they can afford to dispense with the refining and polishing influence of true politeness. Therefore, whether old or young, male or female, rich or poor, cultured or uncultured, this excellent work, the latest and best authority on modern etiquette, must appeal to all.

Margaret E. Sangster

A Home Service for Every Day

A Priceless Volume for Daily Use in Christian Families

Bishop John H. Vincent

"Family prayer is an institution of priceless value where it is kept up conscientiously, seriously, regularly, and where it is endorsed by domestic administration and personal example. Where it is a part of a steady and genuine life, and not performed perfunctorily, it is full of power. The memory of it goes through life, hallowing every thought of home, reminding the wanderer of the days of innocence and devo- tion, and alluring him again to Christ, who was so long enshrined in the family circle. May the truth and the teaching presented in this volume find living administration and enforcement in the homes of its readers."

Among the Villages of India

Phases of Gospel Work in Remote Sections---The Lepers and their Needs

BY MR. AND MRS. F. P. WILEY

MISSION work among the village people in India is very interesting. We do not have farmhouses scattered along over a large portion of the country as in America, but the farmers all live together in a little round village, and the land for miles around. Those villages are usually surrounded by trees, which form a sort of protecting wall.

In the rice districts, nearly all the land around a village is divided into irregular fields, surrounded by a mud wall about six feet high, which keeps the water from running off after a big rain; for rice grows only in a few inches of water. One man, called the malguzar, or head-man of the village, usually owns the land and lets it out to the villagers, in return for a certain part of the crop. They are a simple people, and when they see you walking into their village, or driving with a bullock cart, they stop and look, and if you are friendly, they will bring you a cot to sit down upon. They have no chairs to offer for seats, so they bring a low wooden bed, usually four or five feet long and two or three feet wide, with a top of woven rope. After singing a few hymns (or bhajans), the missionaries talk to them about Christianity. Then the meeting closes with a prayer. The audience changes, as the natives are open at night during the hot season, and closed throughout the day. The mission house at Gondia, is made of mud and bamboo, with only two rooms, and very low. When we enter a village, we hire any house we can, in order to get an opportunity to preach the Gospel there. One of the photographs shows the style of carts used in India. They have no springs, and the already described, yet for the past six months we have become specially interested in fifty lepers, who live about two miles from Raj-Nandgaon, the headquarters of our Pentecost Band Mission. Raj-Nandgaon is about half-way between Bombay and Calcutta.

We found these lepers in an awful condition, huddled together in a small house—the men, women and children crowded in one room. Among them are two who cannot walk.

While we were very busy with our other work, we kept thinking of these lepers, and the question came to us, "What would Jesus do?" While we use every precaution, and do not personally touch them, yet we felt that instead of "passing by on the other side," like the Levite, we ought to stop and do what we could to alleviate their suffering, by helping them physically and spiritually. We feel like making a comfortable home for them, and to build houses, so that the men, women and children could be kept separate. Twenty dollars will support a leper patient a whole year. The leper problem can be partially solved by the segregation of the sexes. Among these fifty lepers, there are now four children under a year old. If these children can be taken away from their have to do their work; but there are usually many who are glad to hear it all.

Sometimes we spend a little time calling at the houses. Our method is to go into a village and hire a house large enough for two or three workers to live in. Making this our headquarters, we visit all the surrounding villages periodically, as often as we can. As soon as we are able, we buy some land and put up a bungalow where we can live through the year, as a native house is not safe for a European to live in during the hot season.

We have opened up such an evangelistic station at Khairagarh, twenty-four miles inland from Raj-Nandgaon, the headquarters of our work in the central province of India. We had two acres of land given us at Khairagarh and we are now building a bungalow on it; but we greatly need a well there. This well will cost about $200, and we would be glad to accept help for this purpose from any friends who are interested in our work.

Our mission bungalow at Raj-Nandgaon, is made of bricks and mud, the outside being plastered with lime. It is thirty feet high and eighty feet long, the building being made high on account of the sun. As it is much cooler at night, the windows at the top oxen are driven by ropes through their noses, and by twisting their tails and by goading them with a stick. The top covering of the cart is of bamboo. These are the carts we use in our village work.

While we have 250 orphans and do village work, as parents and kept apart, they may never have that dreaded disease. It has been found by experience that untainted children, put in a proper home, never have leprosy.

The Government has kindly given us twenty acres of land. We are now endeavoring to raise $20,000 to put up the following buildings: A house for the men; one for the women; one for the children, with masonry walls surrounding each; also a little church for religious services, and a house for the missionaries to live in. Besides this, there must be a well for our water, as already mentioned. Our address while in the United States is 223 N. New Jersey Street, Indianapolis, Ind., where all communications from interested friends will receive attention.

Mr. and Mrs. Wiley are now speaking before church audiences and at religious gatherings in this country, with a view to interesting people in their mission work, and especially to secure support for their leper settlement. Any organization wishing to secure their services can do so by writing to either of them at the above address. Their lectures are entertainingly illustrated, and present a phase of missionary effort that deserves to be generously encouraged.

HOW THE MISSIONARIES TRAVEL AMONG THE INDIAN VILLAGES

Rescue Work Among Chinese Girls

VISITORS to the foreign settlement of the City of Shanghai, have often remarked the extraordinary prevalence of vice in that section of the Chinese Empire. Hundreds of native girls from the country round about Canton are literally bought every year and brought to these dens of vice, where they are forced to lead lives of misery and shame. Knowing that this condition of affairs was largely due to the foreign element in Shanghai, the Taotai at one time sent an appeal to the foreign authorities in the settlement, requesting their intervention to control the evil. But the foreigners remained indifferent, claiming that it was a matter for the Chinese themselves to settle. At this hour of the afternoon, the street was crowded.

Thousands of these poor slaves are coming from every province of China into this great mart of Satan, bought or rented or pawned by fathers and brothers and husbands—yes, and even by mothers. But if the great mass of foreigners were indifferent, God was working in other hearts. After the great Conference on Women's Work in China, held in Shanghai, in 1900, a little company of believing women, missionaries, joined prayer and purpose that definite rescue work should be undertaken in Shanghai. This was the nucleus of the Committee which has since been somewhat enlarged, and under whose management a Rescue Home was opened, Nov. 21, 1901, at 2663 Seward Road. A year later, it became formally affiliated with the National Florence Crittenton Association. Three years have passed since the Home was opened, and our fourth year of work will soon be begun.

During that time over sixty girls have been in the Home, and over fifty of them have been rescued from lives of sin in Shanghai. The story of even these sixty lives, if it could be written, would form a chapter which mothers' hearts in Christian lands would weep to read.

Nearly all of our girls have been sent to the Home by the native magistrate of the Mixed Court in Shanghai. Through United States Consul Goodnow, the Shanghai Taotai was interested in the work. As these girls are bought and sold, they belong to their owners, and can escape only by running away. There is, however, a Chinese law that a woman cannot be forced to girl to get away. Many of them are intimidated by the false representations of the Home which are current.

The Home occupies two native houses in a crowded Chinese quarter of the settlement. In the two houses are two separate families, one made up of the old girls, whose average age is nineteen, and the other the children under sixteen. Any one looking into the bright, happy faces of the girls in the children's home would find it hard to believe that they had been trained up for lives of sin. Sad beyond telling is the lot of these children. No words can picture too darkly the horror of such a child's life.

Yet so wonderful is the power of Christian love that when these little lives are taken into the care of a Christian home they very soon change into wholesome, happy children, thoroughly enjoying their natural life of work and play.

The work among the older girls is more difficult but scarcely less hopeful, for they, too, respond surely though more slowly to the influence of Christian teaching. They spend the mornings in study, learning to read the Bible and receiving such further teaching as to fit them for the duties of a Christian woman's life. The afternoons are given to industrial work, sewing, embroidery and drawing, the proceeds of which help toward the support. The work is entirely supported by voluntary contribution most of which, though far, have come from the missionaries and the Chinese who have given with great liberality, to a work whose service to their people they regard with sincere appreciation.

Feeding the Homeless

BY the time that this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers, Thanksgiving Day will have come and gone. Once more the Bowery Mission will have opened its hospitable doors to the unfortunate poor of New York, and for one day in the year, at least, their pangs of hunger will be assuaged by the good things generously given to many a half-starved man and boy. The Thanksgiving Day turkey dinner to 600 destitute boys; the breakfast of hot coffee and rolls given before daylight; the hundred "basket dinners" given to poor families for home cooking, and the dinners to 600 men in the evening, will have been relished and appreciated by the beneficiaries. Those of our readers who have co-operated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in spreading this feast before the hungry will be doubly happy as they picture the scene, when good Mrs. Bird, Superintendent Hallimond, and Dr. Klopsch, with full hearts and hands, move about among these men and boys, with kindly, encouraging words for all.

As the early breakfast to unemployed men and boys, begun on Thanksgiving morning, will be continued every morning during the cold weather, contributions for that purpose will be welcomed. It does not seem very cold to us, perhaps, to the well-clad and well-nourished, who can hurry through the frosty streets to warm and comfortable homes; but it is bitter indeed, already, to the man who, with scant attire and empty stomach, faces a night in the streets. Anyone interested in these early morning breakfasts can, by sending their address, receive a card giving full information as to this branch of the work of the Bowery Mission, in which all may have a share, for a very small contribution. Address, "Early Breakfast," CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Simple Philosophy

A VERY common error in a large percentage of people of the present day is covetousness.

A great many of the Lord's commandments and precepts were given for our special benefit. This is particularly true of the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet."

Most of us, with natural inclination to do right, would not think of wronging anyone purposely, much less of deliberately and continually breaking one of the ten commandments, but are we not frequently if not continually, wishing for impossible things. Do we not occasionally compare our possessions and environments with the more pretentious ones coming constantly under our notice? And have we ever derived any benefit, comfort, or pleasure out of such thoughts?

A wholesome desire to improve one's condition is always legitimate, particularly when accompanied with proper plans for reaching the desired end; but just what to desire, aim for, and expect to attain, is the all-important question.

One of the most common mistakes is to estimate everything on a money value basis. We brought no money into the world with us, nor can we take any out of it when we die. The greatest blessings that humanity can possibly enjoy are not purchasable with money. One of the best ways to increase happiness is to learn to appreciate the blessings we already have. Many fail to distinguish between the substance and the shadow, and actually lose the former while chasing the latter.

We should not be forever chasing the illusive dollar, but should take a breathing spell occasionally, and get in touch with Nature, and behold some of the priceless gems of the present and the future.

The Mother's Month of Joy

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

CLIMBED the steep stairs of an East-side tenement one gray afternoon and tapped at a door I knew. "Come," called a soft voice. I entered a room furnished with a stove, a table, some chairs and a chair or two. Out of this opened a room, dark, save for the light from the kitchen windows, and just large enough for a bed, a bit of a bureau, and a chair. The bed was close against the wall. "This way, please," called the soft voice, and I went into the little room, and stood beside the bed.

A young woman lay there, pale, wan, and weak. She pulled down the quilt with a hand that trembled, and showed me with a pride that fairly illuminated her face, the tiny head in the arc of her arm. Her eyes were wells of joy.

"See," she said, "the little ear, and the little hand. Did you ever think a baby could be so sweet?"

Thus may Mary the Blessed have gazed upon her Child of Heaven when he lay on the straw in the Manger, and the cattle gazed in wonder, and the shepherds knelt in adoration.

"Who takes care of you?" I asked this obscure Mary, child of the people and born to poverty.

"A neighbor woman looks after us, until John comes back from his work," she said. "We don't want for anything, nor need much care, baby and I."

A friend visiting in a home like this, lean but bare, a home where already the little heads clustered around the stove—there is no other fireside in a tenement—and where the cupboard was often empty, and the rent was an increasing source of anxiety, said to the mother of the house, "Tell me what I can do to help you?"

"Why, nothing, dear lady," was the laughing reply, "unless you'd give me a little white frock for the kid that's coming!"

First-born, or last-born, the baby that opens its eyes in a home of poverty usually finds love ready to pick it up and make much of it.

Never shall I forget the radiance in the countenance of a homely Scotch woman, who with her good man and their eight children had managed to cross the seas, and find a foothold in the land of promise. The dire need that stared and shouted at me from every one of the four walls of their rear-tenement home was appalling, but the blue-eyed mother did not seem oppressed. "Oh, but the Lord has been good," she exclaimed, as she held in her arms a mite of an infant, a wee thing born soon after the family had landed. "Look at my Annie, American born, to bring us all good luck, the darling!"

A few streets off, for luxury and squalor are near neighbors in a cosmopolitan town, there is a beautiful room, where, waited on by a white-capped nurse, and ministered to by the most devoted of medical attendants, a young mother broods over her new treasure. She, too, is so happy that words fail to express her joy. The heir is born, the face of the world has changed.

An incentive undreamed of has come to the father of the little one in the crib. He walks downtown with a pride of ownership in the child that is his, which is like decoration. Ah,

Home is the Kingdom
And Love is the King.

And till the baby is fairly in one's arms, its little rose-leaf hands and its little crumpled feet here to touch, the father does not know what a wealth is his.

Wife by my side
And my baby on knee,

he will sing after a while, and envy no monarch on earth.

The servants move about quietly, the relatives who come to inquire step softly about, and, in the home of plenty, a great peace enfolds the mother and babe during the first month of complete joy.

This month should be consecrated to sleep, to silence, to repose. Baby is not to be exhibited. The mother should not ing nothing so much as regular care and an abundance of sleep. That the foundation for the baby's growth and good behavior through infantile years is laid during the first month is obvious. Before the faintest quiver of intelligence or individuality is awakened, the little one's training begins.

The mother who loves her baby more than she loves herself, will not hold baby too constantly, nor carry baby when he cries, nor, if she can help it, teach her little one the alphabet of despotism at too early a stage of his existence.

child is a nursing baby, be sure the supply of milk is plentiful, and have a little examined by the doctor, to see if it is strong enough to suit the baby's needs. A bottle baby who cries from hunger, should have the amount of food made greater and the strength a little increased. The cry of a really sick child is feeble and whining. The cry of temper or indulgence, is loud and strong, accompanied by kicking or stiffening of the body. It can be easily told, for when the baby gets what he wants, he at once stops.

The cry of temper should never be given in to or the mother will regret it later. Baby's training must be begun from the first day. He should not be rocked to sleep, trotted, nor walked the floor with, allowed to suck his thumb or a "pacifier;" all of these habits will soon have to be broken, so why begin them? He needs all the love he can get, but he should be made a happy little blessing, and not a haughty little tyrant.

Fortunate is the mother who is able herself to nurse her child, thus weaving about it silver cords of love during its earliest life. So instant is the babe's response to her moods when she nurses it with her own milk, that if she be angry, she may infuse poison into its veins and make it very ill; that if she be habitually ill-humored she may give its temper a twist that years will hardly disentangle. And if she be sorrowful, her mood will cloud her babe's. "Do not cry over your baby child," said a woman of ninety to a young mother whose tears were dropping on the wee face as she nursed it. "Don't you know that your eyes are the baby's heaven?"

The mother's mood when she nurses her child should be tender, tranquil, and, above all, joyous. So much of the minor key is forever with us, so often in future will

The little feet that such long years
Must wander on through toil and tears, encounter rough places, that in mother's arms there should be only bliss and calm content. A spiritual atmosphere, full of peace should be the environment of the little one in its infancy. If a nurse must relieve a mother of her most hallowed office she should be chosen, not merely for health, but for character as well.

Rich laces, heavy insertions, fine embroideries, the garniture of wealth, are not appropriate to a little morsel of humanity, a being yet in embryo. The softest, sheerest linen, the finest wool, and the daintiest stitches befit baby's costume, but elaboration is wholly out of place. Everything baby wears should be easy to launder and adapted to the exigencies of growth.

As children hurt their plants by incessant uprooting that they may see how fast they are growing, so a mother may retard her child's growth by too much fussing. Baby Number One is so inherently a sovereign that he is fussed over and fidgeted about, as his successors are not. The middle child and the youngest child in a large family flourish and develop healthfully, though less maternal vigilance is spent on every breath they draw than is lavished on the eldest-born.

Blessed is the nursery wherein successive claimants own the little crib and share the mother's love. There is love enough to go round when the heads cluster round the table, and are like a row of little steps, a year or two apart, their parents' greatest wealth.

WOMEN LABORERS IN TOKIO

It seems very strange to us to see women doing such hard outdoor work as these Japanese women are engaged in, building the elevated railroad in Tokio. But it may not really be harder on back and shoulders than a long day's work at washing and ironing. And it is very strange to think of elevated railways in the Far East. Rapidly the East is rivaling the West, in its progress in invention and applied science.

receive visits. When she is strong enough, she may send messages to her kindred and the home people, especially the grandmothers, who are almost as deeply interested as herself, in the newcomer upon our earth, may venture into the quiet chamber; but for baby's sake and hers, the mother's first month of possession, should be a month of retreat.

During the first four weeks, the baby is nothing more than a living, breathing creature of infinite slumbering capacities, but, for the present, dominant and heed-

"A certain amount of crying," says Dr. Emelyn L. Coolidge, "is absolutely necessary for a baby if he is to be strong and healthy. Under no circumstances, should he be given 'soothing syrups' to quiet him."

A young mother will soon learn to tell the cry of pain: it is strong, sharp, but not continuous, often accompanied by contractions of the features and drawing up of the legs. The cry of hunger, is a continuous, fretful sound after feeding, or some time before the next meal. If the

A Nation's Liberty Lost

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

OBELISK RECORDING ASSYRIA'S VICTORY

THE dies iræ had dawned upon the kingdom of Israel. It has been on the way for 254 years since King Jeroboam set up the two calves of gold for the people to worship them, instead of the true and living God. The streets are filled with a foreign foe whose visages are as wicked and fierce as the wild boar. They are all the more fierce, because for nearly three years they have been kept at bay by the strong ramparts of the city. There is a deafening sound of crashing stones as house after house is razed by the invaders, and as the rocks which formed the ramparts are hurled into the valley below. The piercing shrieks of women, and the cries of children punctuate the thunder of destruction. The sky is lurid with flames from fires set by the torches of the Assyrians. And where are the drunkards so faithfully named by God's prophets, Amos, Hosea and Isaiah? The drunkards? Yes. Their wine-cups are overturned, and with red eyes they look about them in dismay. Their weak and staggering limbs refuse to bear them to a place of safety. Their enemies bind them with chains, and lead them away to far distant lands across rivers and deserts and mountains. The women and children are crowded into wagons, or made to walk the weary way, driven along with the herds of sheep and cattle.

Was the disaster known in Jerusalem? Undoubtedly, but no force was then able to go out and cope with the great Sargon and his host of Assyrians. The people of Judah were themselves enfeebled by their vices, and were only just recuperating strength under the combined effort of King Hezekiah and the prophet Isaiah. King Hezekiah had sent letters to the people of Israel, the drunkards of Ephraim, only six years before, urging them to come up to Jerusalem at the time of the reopening of the Temple and the Feast of the Passover. But the letters were left unanswered.

It is the evening of the dies iræ. The fires have died out, and sitting among the embers and broken stones, are here and there groups of wretched-looking men and women, some of them idiots, some of them aged, some of them utterly besotted, such as the Assyrians considered not worth taking away, like the lees in the wine-glass. Twenty-seven thousand, two hundred and eighty of the likely citizens, make up the captives that are gone.

These who had been left behind had not grit enough to reorganize themselves. They wander about beyond the limits of their ruined city looking for food, and many of them are eaten by lions in search of prey. In fear and distress, they remember God, and petition the King of Assyria that he will send back one of the priests to teach them the laws of God. This the king consents to do. (The copy of the law which this priest carried back with him may be the now famous Samaritan Pentateuch.) The priest dwells in Bethel, "the place of the calf." Such a choice does not bode good for the spiritual development of the Samaritan remnant.

Strange people appear in Samaria, and they make for themselves a kind of dwelling never seen in that part of the world before. The King of Assyria has sent colonies of his people in the room of those he has taken captives. They not only build their homes, but they build temples and set up idols in the forms of cocks, goats, dogs, asses, peacocks, horses, etc. The feeble-minded remnant intermarried with these idolaters, and so arose Samaritans. Can we wonder that the Jews should have "no dealings" with them? Christ, in his mercy, passed them not by, but abode with them ten days to give them the Gospel, and afterwards healed the lepers within their borders.

Neither can we forget the "Good Samaritan," whom Christ has given as an example for all people, in all parts of the world, to show what a good neighbor should do.

ILLUSTRATION AND APPLICATION

"Lost." What pathos there is in the word wherever seen or heard! Even "lost articles" are often tragic. Here is a woman bringing home the earnings of a whole season, to live on for another season. She lays down her pocket-book to examine a piece of dress goods, and when she turns to pick it up, it has disappeared. She will suffer unspeakably in body and mind, and the more that it was her own fault. Here is another woman traveling alone without money, who loses her ticket afar from home on a train with only strangers about her; and again self-blame intensifies the anguish. And yet another throws out of the car window, with some bones from her lunch, a ring more precious than gold, the gift of a mother in heaven. Self-reproach once more intensifies the hopeless loss. But how much keener the interest when a man is missing! Has he become insane, or has he been murdered? "A child lost." The cry arouses the sympathy of the whole city; sometimes of the whole country, as in the case of Charlie Ross. Every household thinks, "What if it was our darling?" Far greater the tragedy when a whole nation loses its liberty by conquest! Deepest tragedy of all to the God's eye view, when a person or a nation loses liberty by self-enslavement to sin! That is what Jesus referred to when he said, "The son of man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." To lose personal character is the supreme loss, excelled only when a nation loses its character, and as a consequence, enters upon captivity, whether abroad or at home. The world, for centuries has sought for the our liberty if we do not wish to do wrong, any more than our neighbor's fence restricts our liberty when we do not wish to trespass on our neighbor's yard. You can do what you please, if you please to do what is right. A so the child's definition is all right, after all, for people who are all right.

And how can we get right, so that what pleases God pleases us, and what we permit ourselves will be on what God permits, and what we forbid ourselves will what God forbids? That is the meaning of the binding and the loosing, and the power of the keys, given not Peter only, but to all the Apostles, and so to us all, we have noted in previous lessons. The key is the symbol of power to open and close gates, to forbid and permit entrance, to bind and loose prisoners. The meaning is the same as when it is said of Jesus in the first chapter of John's Gospel, "To as many as received him, gave power to become sons of God." He who truly receives Christ in his heart, loves what Christ loves, and hates what he hates, and so pleases to do what he permits, and does not wish to do what he forbids. He who has will to do ill, is free in his innermost soul. That is true "personal liberty," and in contrast, what is commonly called by that name is seen to be personal slavery.

"The law of the spirit of life hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8:2). This freedom not fully received in conversion, but is slowly achieved as the crown of character, which is a lofty tree whose root is love, whose trunk is law, whose sap is life, whose topmost, perfect fruit is spiritual liberty. Talk "achievements"—to achieve such personal liberty is the greatest achievement of which any man by God's help, capable—to "bring into captivity every thought to the obedience that is in Christ," so that not only the work of our mouths, but the very imaginations and innermost preferences of our hearts are acceptable in God's sight!

During the first year at Chautauqua, on the night of the feast lights, a very large toy balloon, rising, was caught in the upper branches of a tall tree, and as the multitude watched breathlessly, there seemed to be a battle between the invisible force that sought to lift the balloon heavenward, and the tree that seemed a giant, dragging it back to earth, the old battle between light and darkness, between the flesh and the spirit. At last light triumphed, and the balloon untorn, pulled itself free from the last earthly entanglement, and rose into the freedom of the upper air, watched eagerly as it moved on until it shone as a heavenly star—a picture of him who obeys all law freely, because he loves God with all his heart, and his neighbor himself.

There is only one greater achievement possible in this world, and that is, for a nation to achieve, some good degree, such a character that it shall forbid itself what God forbids, and permit itself only what God permits. The chosen people coming out of slavery in Egypt with souls as well as bodies scarred with their chains, as their wanderings and murmurings in the exodus show so plainly, through the loving kindness and loving severity of God achieved at last, in a good degree, a God-pleasing character, seen at its best in Solomon's day, when the "Land of Promise" was, for the first time, the land possessed and when the nation gathered in unity about the glorious temple.

"Liberty Enlightening the World," which stands at the entrance of New York Harbor, was once worshipped as an idol. An aged woman and her grown son were on their way from Mount Lebanon to the United States. When they saw the great statue, nobody told them what it was, and they thought it must be Christ representing the Christian land, which they were about to enter. They dropped upon their knees on the deck of the ship and poured out their loving gratitude for the welcome which the outstretched arm seemed to offer them. It is indeed true that liberty is the gift of Christ, and that the freedom America offers to the foreigner, is the work of Christ operating through the God-fearing men who founded the nation. The sacred individuality of every human has come to be appreciated, because Jesus taught that every man and woman is a son or daughter of God, a brother or sister of Christ, for whom he died, and so brother or sister of the King, sharing his right to rule a brother or sister of every human being, to be loved and helped, not hated or harmed. That is the way civil liberty follows wherever Christ leads.

"SO WAS ISRAEL CARRIED AWAY OUT OF THEIR OWN LAND TO ASSYRIA"

"lost tribes" of this lesson. But it is worth while to find why they lost their liberty, that we may not do the same.

Liberty Achieved. What is liberty? A class of children answer in chorus, "To do as you please." And most of the grown-ups make no dissent to the definition. But what if to do as you please interferes with the liberty of some one else to do as he pleases? A boy pleases to make a great noise, for example, when a sick lady next door would be pleased to have him quiet. One man is pleased to let his hens run wild, but the next neighbor is not pleased to have them scratch up his garden. Manifestly one has no true liberty to displease others, and especially, not to wrong others. Your liberty is fenced about with laws, that protect the rights and liberties of others. There can be no real liberty, except "liberty under law." In the words of Rev. Dr. Oerter, speaking to a meeting of German-Americans, "Liberty is the right to act without interference, within the limits of law." The Founders of America came here for "freedom to worship God." Some others have come later for freedom to do evil. But there can be no liberty to do wrong; only true liberty is liberty to choose among various ways of doing right. Liberty then is an ample space within a smooth circle of law, that protects the rights of others. But that circle of law does not really restrict

Gen. Lew Wallace's Illness

GEN. LEW WALLACE, the famous author of Ben Hur, is dangerously ill. He has been in a serious physical condition for some months past, and his physician holds out little hope of his recovery. For several years the General has been a sufferer from chronic indigestion, and the disease has left him in a state where it is not possible for him to obtain sufficient nourishment from food to keep up his vital forces for any length of time. He is, however, very brave and courageous of spirit, his one desire seeming to be to live long enough to finish his autobiography, upon which he has been at work for some time.

Although "Lew Wallace," as his friends and the public love to call him, came into special prominence upon the publication of Ben Hur, he was a man of affairs long before he became an author, and brought out his famous book. He was born in Brookville, Franklin County, Ind., April 10, 1827. Having studied law, he entered into practice, but left it to serve in the Mexican War. After the war was over, he returned to his profession, locating in Covington and later in Crawfordsville, Ind., where his home now is.

Gen. Wallace's war record shows him to have been a brave soldier. He took part in many different battles, notably that of Shiloh. He organized the defense of Cincinnati, and saved that city from capture by Gen. E. Kirby Smith, and later, he intercepted the march of Gen. Jubal A. Early upon Washington. He fought in the battle of Monocacy and saved Washington from capture, July 9, 1864.

In 1878, Gen. Wallace was elected Governor of New Mexico, serving in that capacity until 1881, when he was appointed United States Minister to Turkey. In 1880 appeared Ben Hur, A Tale of the Christ. This remarkable book has been widely read, and so vivid and realistic are its pictures of life in the time of our Saviour, that the tale took a strong hold upon the reading public. There is no more touching sentence between the covers of this wonderful book than the two lines of dedication, which tell so much in their simplicity: "To the wife of my youth, who still abides with me." The author has written and published several other books, which have been very favorably received by the public, notably, The Life of Benjamin Harrison, The Boyhood of Christ, and The Prince of India. The amount of research necessary to the writing of this latter work was immense, yet the human interest never flags. There is a fine conjunction of historical and imaginative material in the tale. It has been said that in invention, in the power to make mind impressions, in thrilling interest, The Prince of India is not inferior to Ben Hur, but the author's fame rests more fully upon the earlier work, and with it his name will always be more closely associated. One of the General's attendant physicians says that he may live for several weeks, although he is receiving no nourishment from food, and is sustained entirely upon mild stimulants. He is gradually wasting away, but is much sustained by his strong will power. It is a pathetic picture, that of this brave old man, striving to keep alive long enough to finish the story of his life, replete as it has been with such stirring scenes and momentous events. It recalls another similar struggle, when the great General, who brought the Civil War to a successful close, fought off unrelenting death in the cottage at Mt. Gregor, in 1885.

General Wallace is now in his seventy-eighth year. Should he be spared to complete his book, it will no doubt prove most instructive and entertaining, and there will be an added interest, in that it was the last work of a rarely gifted Christian.

"have lately subscribed 130,000 francs for the erection of a large hall of sufficient size to accommodate the great audiences which now gather at these services. When the building is finished, I intend that it shall be called 'The Home of the Soul!'"

As he said this, he looked up with a smile which had in it a glow of triumph, and his strong Bismarckian face was lighted up with enthusiasm. His idea touched the very climax of the simple philosophy he had been teaching these many years past.

He was greatly interested to learn of the remarkable work of the Bowery Mission among the unfortunate men of New York, and to know of the far-reaching influence of its rescue work. Pastor Wagner will make a personal address at the meeting in the Bowery Mission Hall, on the evening of the date of this issue, and it goes without saying he will speak to a very large and highly appreciative audience.

It is a rare pleasure to listen to this big-hearted, finely educated Christian preacher. Though now become world famous, he is yet as simple as a child. His conversation overflows with tenderness and human feeling, and the dominant desire to help others is evident in all he says. His own career is one of the best exemplifications of the Simple Life—there is no thought of self; it is all for others. His highest wish is to win souls from sin and to bring them back to Christ.

In addressing a public gathering a few nights ago, Pastor Wagner gave his impressions of America and its people. He said: "The more I look at your life in this country, the more I feel that at the bottom of your national life, at the bottom of your history, at the bottom of your traditions, is a great simplicity. I am only a young American as yet; but I have felt it." He spoke of being struck with the simple reverence we pay to our statesmen—the men who made the nation what it is; of the difference between the militarism of Europe's courts and palaces, and the simplicity of Washington, with its White House unguarded, and its Executive as plain in his surroundings as any other citizen.

"At the bottom of your national life, your history, and your great traditions, there is a noble simplicity. You American people, if you would stay the people you are, ready to teach the young who are coming to you, stay simple, stay true to your magnificent ideals.

"Simplicity," he said, in conclusion, "is not of any time nor of any country. It is not of the exterior; it is from the heart."

Questions and Answers

H. M. H. Tell me the author of the quotation, "An honest man's the noblest work of God."
The line occurs in Alexander Pope's Essay on Man. It was also used by Burns, in The Cotter's Saturday Night.

P. F., Rialto, Fla. What is the meaning of the expression in the Apostle's Creed, the Holy Catholic Church?

It does not, as you suppose, relate to the Roman Catholic Church, but to the Church universal. The word catholic means universal. It was first used to indicate the difference between Christianity and the Jewish faith, which was restricted to one race. Christianity is for the whole world. It means all those who are really united to Christ by a living faith and whose names are written in heaven, by whatsoever name they are known among men. Pearson, whose work on the Creed is regarded as a standard, says of this clause: "The catholicity of the Church consists in universality, embracing all sorts of persons, of all nations, comprehending all ages, containing all necessary and saving truths, obliging all men to obedience, and planting all graces in the souls of men."

James D., Waterbury, Conn. What tribes of Indians are in Canada?

Canada's Indian tribes include these: In Ontario province, parts of the Six Nations, Wyandots, Chippewas, Minsees, Mississaugas, and others of Algonquin stock. In Quebec, another part of the famous Six Nations, besides Abenakis, Montagnais, Micmacs, and other smaller tribes. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward's Island, the Micmacs, and in New Brunswick, a party of the same tribe and a few Micmacs. In Manitoba and the Northwest Territory, the Chippewas, Crees, Blackfeet, and Dakotas. The Athabasca district is peopled by Crees, Assiniboines, Chippewas and Beavers, while British Columbia and Rupert's Land contain a great number of small Indian tribes.

C. W., Easton, Minn. 1. Who were the Philistines? 2. Is it right to keep Good Friday sacred?

1. Their origin is unknown. It is thought they may have been immigrants from some African district, probably Copts, who settled on the western shores of Palestine, before the time of Abraham. They expelled the Canaanites, and continued to hold the land against Joshua and the Judges. Saul was unable to wrest Philistia from them. David overcame them and kept them in subjection. They were still a nation at the time of the Babylonian captivity. 2. Why not? It is the one date in the history of our Lord of which we are sure. The date of his birth is doubtful, though it was probably about Christmas; but the date of his death is fixed by the Passover celebration. Its place in our calendar varies, but it was fixed by the ancient mode of reckoning. An event so momentous deserves that the day on which it occurred should be kept sacred.

N. O., Central City, Colo. There is a saying sometimes used, as coming from the Bible: "As a tree falleth, so it lieth." If this is in the Bible, I fail to find it.

See Eccles. 11: 3. You should have a Bible with a Concordance or Word Book, to enable you to find such passages.

Arthur Meacham, Minneapolis, writes: Millions have by God's blessing been saved through the means of Gospel tracts. The great leaders of religious revivals—Latimer, Cranmer, Baxter, Wesley, Whitefield, Charles Simeon, Hannah Moore, and many others, bear witness to the power of tracts. I hope many will systematically distribute tracts, booklets, floral Scripture cards, and the Gospels. These precious messages of salvation will never die. Do this noble work and your joy will be unspeakable.

Reader, Fredonia, Pa. What is the true method of reckoning the tithe for a business man?

It is to tithe the income, that is, to give one-tenth of the income. It would obviously be unjust to give one-tenth of the gross receipts. Thus, if at the end of the month or year, it is found that a certain sum has been received, there should be deducted from that amount the cost of the goods sold, and the cost of conducting business—rent, light, taxes, wages, advertising, etc.—such expenses as are strictly business expenses. The balance is income, the profits of the business, after those expenses are paid. This is what belongs to the man, to pay household expenses, support his family, and to add to his savings. This is his income and it is that which is available for tithing. If he has shares, or bonds, or money out on mortgage, he does not pay tithe on the money so invested, but on the interest or proceeds. His capital and savings would disappear if every year he gave one-tenth of it away.

F. A. G., Iota, La. Is anything known of the history of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary, after the mention of his going to Nazareth (Luke 2: 51) when he returned from Jerusalem?

Nothing is recorded. He is not mentioned by any of the Evangelists after that incident. Christ's words on the Cross (John 19: 26), when he committed his mother to the care of John, would imply that Joseph, who would be her natural protector, was dead.

N. O. S., Evansville, Ind. Great good could be accomplished by securing a fund to be used in printing a book of instruction and advice, to be given every boy and girl in the land, to guide them towards a pure and temperate life, and show them somewhat of the dangers and folly in such things as the saloon, the dance-hall, cards, gambling, tobacco, vulgarity, profanity, etc. The book should be attractively bound and printed. No other single movement would result in as much good.

This is already been done almost universally by the religious press throughout the country. Besides, there is a special series of books for young people known as The Purity Series, which deals with this class. These books are ably edited by Rev. Dr. Stall, an eminent authority.

Mrs. C. McLennan, of Chicago (a reader), writes that the name of the prophet referred to in I Kings, Chap. 13, as "The Man of God," is given in chapter 9 of Josephus' Antiquities as Jadon. It is nowhere given in the Scriptures.

L. H. S., Battle Creek, Ia. 1. What were the Nobel prizes? 2. Where is the island where Dreyfus was confined?

1. Alfred Bernhard Nobel, a famous Swedish inventor, chemist and physicist, left his great fortune of nearly $10,000,000 to found a prize fund yielding $40,000 yearly, which is divided into five equal parts, and awarded as prizes to the persons who during the year have done the best work in (1) physical science, (2) chemistry, (3) physiology or medicine, (4) idealistic literature, and (5) the advancement of universal peace. A number of awards have already been made. 2. Devil's Island is off the coast of French Guiana.

E. P., Oxford, Pa. Does the atonement of Christ avail for sins committed by a Christian after his conversion?

Necessarily, otherwise who could be saved? This doctrine, however, is not to make the believer careless. He must be constantly watchful against sin, and constantly seek Christ's help to lead a holy life. He is saved that he may be delivered from sin, not that he may remain in it. The child who has been forgiven by his father for some serious offence, would be ungrateful if he repeated it on the supposition that his father would continue to forgive him. The Apostle Paul deals with the subject in Rom. 6: 1, 2, and in other passages.

C. M. Edmunds, Sheridan, N. Y., would like some reader to send him the name of the author of the poem beginning:

So little of the Christ in me I find,
So poor my soul, so naked and so blind.
I wonder much, if in his hands will be,
A robe of righteousness for such as me.

L. B. L., Smithfield, Pa. Can all Christians pray in public? Does the Bible require them to do so without regard to ability?

By no means. See I. Cor., 12, 13 and 14th chapters. Each person has his or her own individual gift or ability and is expected to act accordingly. Those who have not cultivated the faculty of speaking in public may have some other quality which is quite as essential to the advancement of the Lord's work, though in a different way. When it comes to making public confession of our spiritual allegiance, however, all should be ready. It needs no eloquence, no sustained speeches to do this. A single word is enough to proclaim one's faith to the world, and this at least is expected of us. See Luke 12: 9.

Inquirer. Yes, the X-Ray machine, for which Dr. Alice Condict appealed and which is to be used among the sick in India mission work, has been sent to India. It should reach the Lodhiana mission station some time this month. Contributions fell short of the amount required for the machine, and any sum you or others may send for that purpose will be applied toward completing the payment.

The Cosmopolitan Magazine

FOR 1905

The Seventeenth Year Under the Editorial Control of Mr. John Brisben Walker

The Cosmopolitan aims at THREE things:

FIRST: To accomplish each month something, however slight, towards the advancement of the human race.

SECOND: To entertain men and women in their hours of rest—Fiction, Personal Sketches, Travel, Humor.

THIRD: To keep in the advance in discussions of the newest problems of science, of business life, of education, of art, of invention and discovery, and of all those things which concern the lives of men and women.

Concerning Your Home Life

A JOURNAL for the home is one of the necessities of modern family life. It is not merely an entertainer, but the friend and adviser of the members of the household. If it is ably edited and money is freely expended to secure the thought and experience of the best minds, it becomes useful in a thousand ways to both young and old. In a million homes at this season of the year the question is being asked, "What is the best—the very best and most desirable home journal?"

A year ago this idea took form—That home life in America, in addition to the many excellent lady's journals, required something of a new type—better thought, on a wider range of problems—and at the same time better paper—better illustration. Above all, treatment that would be real and true—scientific when science was demanded—and never namby pamby.

The very first issue of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME captured a wide audience. It was recognized as "a periodical for the women who plan their lives and do." It was greeted as a welcome entertainer by every member of the household.

Quisa, A. M. Do you know of a book written by Louisa M. Alcott, entitled, Work, or a Christian Experiment?

It is not in the list of her books. Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, publishers of Miss Alcott's works, may be able to give you the information.

W. K., Orangeville, Ont. 1. Is it right for parents to teach their children to play games? 2. Are there any purely innocent games?

1. Certainly. Children need amusement just as grown folks do, only it must be suited to their years. All over the world, from the beginning of time, childhood has been the period of innocent play, judiciously mingled with instruction, and every parent tries to make that period a happy one for the little folks. 2. There are games which a wise parent knows will do harm. Among these are all gambling games, with cards and dice, and such as lead to the development of a rude, brawling, quarrelsome spirit. But every parent knows of many innocent amusements, which are just what is needed for juvenile entertainment.

A. K., Clio, Ala. Is it true that John Bunyan was a missionary Baptist preacher, and that he was put in Bedford Jail for preaching against infant baptism?

Bunyan, in youth, belonged to no religious denomination, and was very dissolute. Being converted in 1653, two years after he joined the Baptists. For preaching Baptist doctrines to his own congregation at Bedford, he was cast into jail. It was not for preaching against infant baptism that he was imprisoned, but for preaching at all. Bunyan was not an ordained preacher, but a laboring man—a tinker—and certain persons, including college professors and preachers, who ought to have been more tolerant, opposed him, and invoked the law against his irregular ministry, and he was indicted and convicted.

Mrs. J. C. Barney, the well-known Prison angelist, 319 Butler Exchange, Providence, R. I., is doing an excellent work in distributing religious literature, tracts, etc., her prison and rescue field. Any reader interested in her mission can communicate with her at above address.

M. M., La Porte, Tex. Was Paul describing himself in Rom. 7? Can you account for an apostle being in the condition of doing things that he would not?

He was describing a past experience from which, as he says in the last verse of the chapter, he had emerged victorious. It is an intensely dramatic description of the struggle that goes on between the higher and lower nature, and the misery of a man who is striving in his own strength to obey the law of God.

Mrs. E. A. F., Fitchburg, Mass. Yes, the CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1905 will contain many articles dealing with the different races of the world.

An Oklahoma reader, Mr. George Cooper, Kenton, sends us some very pretty verses in the Scottish dialect. The opening stanzas are these:

When in lang canyon yont Kenton I dwell,
Awa' frae earth's tumult for gold and for fame;
A wee wooden shanty I live by myself,
God's love ever hallows my wee humble hame.
O great howlin' blizzards nae dread to me bring,
They strike my wee hoosie an' shake the hale frame;
A' the life's storms blaw hard I creep under His wing,
For I'm safe wi' my Father in my humble hame.

A. B., Winsted, Conn. Are the following statements, recently made by a Christian minister, true? 1. That the Authorized Version of the Bible is full of errors. That we should destroy it and buy the American Revised Version. 2. That the events recorded in the Old Testament occurred hundreds of years before it was written. 3. Do you think such statements judicious?

1. The errors in the Authorized Version, which were corrected in the Revised, were chiefly in grammar and inaccurate translation. They were numerous, but not vital. The revisers made the book much better, but its sense has not been changed. For example, the command (Ex. 20:13), "Thou shalt not kill," has been changed to, "Thou shalt do no murder." The "unicorn" in Job 23:22, is changed to "the wild ox."

Prov. 25:11, "apples of gold in pictures of silver," becomes "apples of gold baskets of silver." You may characterize these as errors, and so speak of the old version as being full of them, but while they are important, they do not affect any vital doctrine. The American version is more accurate, but the charm of the old version and its tender associations endear it to the ordinary Bible reader. 2. Yes, it is true that in some instances the events occurred long before they were recorded. The creation and the flood, for example, must have been long before the time of Moses. We do not know when Samuel, Kings and Chronicles were written, but it is probable that at least many passages were set down near the time when the events they describe occurred. 3. No, it is not judicious to state the facts, as you say the preacher did. It conveys a wrong impression, and is liable to discredit the Book. Considering that the translation was made about three hundred years ago, it is astonishing that it was so good and so accurate as it proves to have been.

Mrs. B., Ivory, N. Y. We can see nothing wrong in holding a reception to your pastor in the church annex. Objections might reasonably be urged against giving a reception and serving refreshments in the church itself, but not in the annex.

H. S. D., Mich City, Ind. The Bencke tablet was a fitting memorial of one who had devoted ten years to the service of the Mission.

A. B. R., Collyer, Kan. The Jews reckon time from the Creation, and the Mohammedans from the Hegira. How the great majority of actual heathen reckon we do not know.

Mary N., Lynn, Mass. Bella Cook still lives at 492 Second Avenue, New York City. Since September, 1855, she has lain upon her bed in a little upper room, but her life has been filled with good and charitable deeds, and many of God's poor have had occasion to call her blessed. Write to her, by all means.

A. P. E., Dixon, Mo. We do not understand your first question. As you know, Christ was called the son of David, as his pedigree shows that through his mother he was descended from him. Your second question involves no difficulty. The name of Jacob was common. The Jacob of the 15th verse lived 1700 years after the Jacob of the 2d verse.

Mrs. A. E., Highland. 1. We believe the Helps bound in with our Teacher's Bible would suit you admirably. A Bible commentary would be the best of the three books mentioned. 2. Leave all non-essentials aside and cling fast to the simple Gospel, the only thing that is essential. Remember what Paul said concerning interpretations and disputations. 3. The United States cannot interfere, but it can offer its services to mediate in the war, and this it has already practically done.

G. S. R., Columbus, O. The population of the Argentine Republic was estimated in 1900, at 1,659,214. As a whole, this vast country is very thinly inhabited. Tribes of native Indians still roam over the less known districts. More than half the population is European. Many immigrants have come from Southern Europe, Italians having the preponderance. Buenos Ayres has 821,291 inhabitants, about one-fourth of whom are whites, the rest being Indians, Negroes, and mixed breeds. Write to Harper Bros., for information regarding the book you wish.

Verna H., Broad Top, Canada. In response to your request we reproduce Paul Lawrence Dunbar's poem, entitled, "Not They Who Soar":

Not they who soar, but they who plod
Their rugged way, unhelped, to God,
Are heroes; they who higher fare,
And, flying, fan the upper air,
Miss all the toil that hugs the sod.
'Tis they whose backs have felt the rod,
Whose feet have pressed the paths unshod,
May smile upon defeated care.

Not they who soar.

High up there are no thorns to prod,
'Nor boulders lurking 'neath the cloud,
To turn the keenness of the share,
For flight is ever free and rare;
But heroes they the soil who've trod,
Not they who soar.

Undigested Coal

"Clinkers" mean wasted fuel—undigested heat—money thrown away. Trying to "pick out" clinkers at the ash-barrel destroys clothes and temper—and risks your health. Why continue to use the clinker-producing, old fashioned heating methods?

AMERICAN & IDEAL RADIATORS & BOILERS

extract the full volume of heat from every ounce of fuel and distribute it exactly where needed. The steam or hot water radiators are set close to or underneath the windows, in outer hallways, along the exposed walls—to meet the incoming cold. The home is warmed uniformly. A turn of the valve quickly heats the radiators; or you turn them off in any unused rooms and SAVE THE HEAT. We have figures that show the fuel saving pays for the outfit—which is so durable it outlasts the house it heats.

Simple to put into OLD or new buildings—cottages to 90-room buildings—without disturbance to building or occupants. Need not be connected to street water supply. Let us send you our booklet "Heating Investments Successful." Enquiries, stating kind and size of building you wish to heat, are very welcome. GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Mrs. Pryor's Reminiscences

ONE of the most delightful books of the season is Reminiscences of Peace and War, by Mrs. Roger A. Pryor, wife of the famous Southern general, which has just been issued by the publishing house of The Macmillan Company, of New York and London. It is a handsome volume of over 400 pages, finely illustrated, and covers an experience dating from Washington, in the fifties, and embracing a wide range of incident during the exciting days of the Civil War. Mrs. Pryor is a felicitous narrator, and the stories that flow from her pen are intensely interesting besides being valuable from a historical point of view.

One of the chapters in this remarkable book gives us an attractive and quaint picture of social life in Washington during Buchanan's administration. Mrs. Pryor writes:

"We attended Dr. Gurley's church and found that the President also had taken a seat in that church. Our own was near the door, and for many Sundays before I knew him, I was interested in seeing him enter the church and walk briskly up to his pew near the pulpit (while the bell was ringing), buttoned in his broadcloth coat, wearing no overcoat in the coldest weather. Immediately after the benediction he would walk rapidly down the aisle, the congregation standing until he passed. Miss Lane attended St. John's Church, and the President was accompanied only by his secretary, Mr. Buchanan Henry. After I knew him quite well, I always spoke to him when he passed me near the door, and I sometimes ventured, 'A good sermon, Mr. President!' he never failing to reply, 'Too long, Madam, too long.'

"I was leading a very happy domestic life, busy with my little boys and my housekeeping, proud of my self-constituted office as my Congressman's private secretary, much exercised in sending documents, seeds and cuttings (we were introducing tea-culture in Virginia) to his constituents, when I was called to order by our dear old friend, Mr. Dudley Mann, an old politician, diplomat, and 'society man.'

"'Madam, did you come to Washington to live in your own house and write letters to farmers?'

"'What better could I do?'

"'The President does not agree with you. He admires your husband and wonders why you were not at the levee. He has asked me to see that you come to the next one.'

"'I shall be on a committee that night,' said my Congressman hastily—he was usually on a committee when a reception was to the fore.

"'I will take her myself,' said Mr. Mann. 'Now, wear a pretty evening dress of silk or velvet. Can it be lavender? And I will call precisely at nine.'

"'I appreciated the honor of Mr. Mann's escort, and, wishing to please him, procured the lavender silk. Our evening gowns were cut straight across the neck, and finished with a bertha of lace. The full skirt was distended over a large hoop. An elaborate headdress of flowers or marabout feathers was de rigueur for a levee, which, however, demanded simpler attire than a ball or a dinner. Our white gloves were short, and were finished at the wrist with a fall of lace three or four inches wide, and a band of ribbon and rosette.

"Mr. Mann approved my attire and gave me a very good time. The crowd was great, and the amplitude and length of the ladies' robes filled me with anxiety. 'Dear Mr. Mann,' I said, 'pray be careful not to tread on the trains.'

"'My child,' he answered, 'I haven't lifted my feet for twenty years!'

"The President detained us for a few courteous words, and we were passed on to Miss Lane, standing, not beside him, but in a group with other ladies. Thence we found our way to the East Room, and a great many ladies and gentlemen were introduced to me, as I stood on the arm of my courtly escort.

"Such a number of cards came to us after this that the housekeeping, the writing, the little boys, the seeds, and the tea-culture in Virginia were likely to suffer.

"The reign of the 'afternoon tea' was not yet—at least not in Washington; but entertainments included morning receptions, evening receptions, dinners, musicales, children's parties, old-fashioned evening parties with music and supper, and splendid balls. So many of these were crowded into a season that we often attended three balls in one evening.

"The first time I dined with the President I made early and elaborate preparation. When the great day arrived, all my paraphernalia, rosetted slippers, gloves, fan, dress, and wrap were duly laid out on my bed and sofa. In the evening I seated myself at a dressing-table and submitted my head to Francois' hands. The evening coiffure was elaborate and troublesome. The hair in front was stiffened with bandoline, and formed into sleek, smooth bandeaux, framing the face. Behind, all the hair was tightly tied, low at the nape of the neck, then divided into two parts, and each woven with many strands into a wide braid. These were curved from ear to ear to form a basket, and within the basket were roses, or pond-lilies, or violets, with long trailing vines floating behind.

"Francois was a very agreeable talker. He had dressed Rachel's hair and was leisurely giving a charming lecture on Rachel's art. Suddenly my husband burst in: 'The carriage is at the door! Hurry, hurry! We've only ten minutes to reach the White House.'

"I literally leaped into my gown, had no time for flowers or jewels, snatched up my gloves, left everything else, and ran! We entered the green room just as Mr. Buchanan Henry was arranging the guests for dinner. Luckily I was low down on his list.

"Dinners at the White House were much less elaborate in their appointments than were dinners at the homes of the wealthy Cabinet officers and Senators. Mr. Buchanan set an example of Republican simplicity. Few flowers were placed in the drawing rooms. In the centre of the Blue Room there was a divan surrounding a stand of potted plants and surmounted by a small palm. The dinner table was not ornamented with flowers, nor were bouquets at the covers. A long plateau, a mirror edged with a hunting scene (gilt figures in high relief), extended down the middle, and from the centre and at the two ends rose epergnes with small crystal dishes for bonbons and cakes.

"One evening the President said to me, 'Madam, what is this small shrub I find always placed before me?'

"'If the berries were white, Mr. President, it would be Ardisia alba.'

"'Ah,' he answered, 'I am all right! My berries are red—I have Ardisia rufa! Miss Harriet has the alba!'

CONCLUDED FROM PRECEDING PAGE

"There were no other floral decorations on the table.

"I once ventured to send the President a Virginia ham, with particular directions for cooking it. It was to be soaked, boiled gently three or four hours, suffered to get cold in its own juices, and then toasted.

"This would seem simple enough, but the executive cook disdained it, perhaps for the reason that it was so simple. The dish, a shapeless, jellylike mass, was placed before the President. He took his knife and fork in hand to honor the dish by carving it himself, looked at it helplessly, and called out: 'Take it away! Take it away! Oh, Miss Harriet! You are a poor housekeeper! Not even a Virginia lady can teach you.'

"A party was once made up for a visit to Mount Vernon, Mr. Augustus Schell, of New York, accompanied Miss Lane. He was a fine-looking fellow and very much in love with her. As they walked along the banks of the Potomac, she picked up a handful of colored pebbles. Mr. Schell requested them of her and put them in his pocket. He took them to Tiffany, had them beautifully polished, set with diamonds, and linked together in a bracelet, and sent them as 'a souvenir of Mount Vernon' to Miss Lane for a Christmas gift.

"She carried them for a week in her pocket, trying to get her own consent to give them up. The more she looked at them the better she liked them. One day the President was in fine spirits. He liked to rally her about Lord Lyons, which she did not fancy overmuch. But this time she humored him, and at last ventured to say, 'Uncle Buchanan, if I have a few pretty pebbles given me, you do not object to my accepting them?'

"Oh, no, Miss Harriet! Keep your pebbles! Keep your pebbles,' he exclaimed in high good humor.

"You know," Miss Lane said, in telling me the story at the time, 'diamonds are pebbles.'

The Reminiscences are bound in cloth covers, top gilt. Price $2. They will doubtless enjoy a deserved popularity with the reading public.

George Whitfield Mead, Ph.D. A practical treatise giving suggestions for the primary and every grade, and dealing with all details of Sunday School management, with illustrations of diplomas, certificates, and plans of Biblical study. Pp. 476. Price $1.50. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

Due Christos, An Outline Study of Japan. By the Rev. William Elliot Griffith. The author has been a lifelong student of the country and its people. This book appears at a time when the attention of the world is centered upon this island empire. Those who are interested in the progress of the Gospel of Peace in Japan, will do well to read this book, which gives in outline, the changes brought about among these interesting and intelligent people, since the early days of the "Land of the Peaceful Shores." Paper covers. 296 pages. Price 30 cents. Published by The Macmillan Co., New York.

The Daily Pathway, by Margaret E. Sangster. All lovers of the writings of Mrs. Sangster will welcome this little volume and linger lovingly over its pages. It is from the heart to the heart, and no one can peruse this book without becoming more humble and gentle in spirit. The author says of the talks, "They touch in simple style and modest intention on some phases of the life of every day as it is lived in the household." The lines, "Taking the year together, my dear, There isn't more night than day."

make a most appropriate motto for this pleasant little volume. Published by The American Tract Society, New York. Price $1.25.

Railroading with Christ, by Rev. Chas. A. S. Dwight. This is the rather startling title of a story of a brave engineer who lost his life in the discharge of his duty. His dying words, "Tell my little Joe to be a man," became the watchword of his son, who became in turn a Christian engineer. Published by American Tract Society, 150 Nassau Street, New York. Price 35 cents.

Love Sonnets of an Office Boy, by S. E. Kiser. Illustrated by J. T. McCutcheon. Published by Forbes & Co., Boston and Chicago. Price 50 cents.

The Sign of the Cross in Madagascar, by J. J. Kilpen Fletcher. An interesting account of the spread of the Gospel in the island of Madagascar, a story of the planting of Christianity in this far-away and benighted land. The narrative beginning with the days of Radama, and the arrival of the first missionaries, down to the great emancipation is based upon historical facts, and is as interesting as any work of fiction, while keeping in the realm of realities. Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Price $1.00.

Prohibition Cartoons, by Stewart, with text by Henry W. Wilbur. This is a series of remarkably clever drawings, illustrating the Prohibition idea and issue in picture writing, as the text explains. There are upwards of 20 full-page cartoons, and they constitute, altogether, about as powerful an argument against the liquor traffic as could be gotten together between covers. Each cartoon is a lesson; and the entire gamut of argument—satire, humor, allegory, fable, denunciation, derision—is utilized with force and ability. No finer object-lesson of the blighting influence of "civilization's curse" could be set before the public than this collection, which should be widely distributed as a means of influencing public opinion. Price $1.00. Published by The Defender Publishing Co., 232 W. Fourteenth Street, New York.

Highways and Byways of the South, by Clifton Johnson. A most interesting volume, showing the rural aspects of national life in all the Southern States east of the Mississippi Valley. It is finely and copiously illustrated from photographs by the author. Price $2. 362 pp. Cloth binding. The Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

The Crusaders, a Story of the War for the Holy Sepulchre, by Rev. A. J. Church, M.A. This will be read with great interest, especially by young people. It is the story of The Wandering Jew in a new form. Cartaphilus, who for the insult he offered to the Saviour, was bidden by Christ to "Tarry till I come"—(continue to live until the end of time)—tells of many events that took place in the passing centuries, but chiefly about the stirring times of the first, third and eighth Crusades. Illustrated by George N. Morrow, and bound in cloth. Pp. 321. Price $1.75. The Macmillan Co., New York, publishers.

Touching Incidents and Remarkable Answers to Prayer; a collection of spiritual experiences by Wesley, Moody, Gough, Talmage, Finney, Prince, Spurgeon, Cullis, Muller, and many others. The Tolstoi Family

DURING the great famine in Russia in 1892, when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S relief cargo, conveyed on the steamship Leo, was being distributed in sixteen different provinces, many Russian ladies assisted in the distribution. Among others of noble rank and title were the members of Count Tolstoi's family. While the Count himself was busy in the interior provinces, the ladies of his household, mother and daughters, rendered excellent service in the capital, where thousands were supplied daily from the public soup-kitchens. In a recent issue, the London Sketch, speaking of the Tolstoi family, says: "English society knows but little of the Russian aristocracy, but one charming subject of the Czar, the Countess Tolstoi, is the wife of Mr. Philip Stanhope, the brother of Earl Stanhope. The Countess often asks her younger relations to stay with her in her delightful London house, and a recent visitor has been Madame Catherine Tolstoi, who has much enjoyed her glimpse of England and the English. The Parliamentary system is a source of great amusement and interest to cultivated Russians; especially do they find much to marvel at in the role the Houses of Parliament are allowed to play in social life."

The Power of Habit*

EVERYONE has had occasion to learn the power of habit. It is one of the mightiest forces of human nature. As every triumph over nature that has been achieved has resulted from placing ourselves in harmony with nature and using her forces for our own purposes, so it is with habit. Realizing its enormous power we may use it for our own benefit; we gain nothing by ignoring or opposing it. Watt, sitting by his mother's fireside, sees the steam lift the lid of the kettle. The nuisance might have set him to devise a new lid, which could not be lifted; but, instead, he takes advantage of the natural force and applies it to human needs. He recognized power, and he knew that power was needed in the world of industry, and he devised a means of harnessing it as the servant of man. So from that simple incident we gained the steam engine. So it is with electricity. We do not understand it, but we know what it will do and what it will not do, and we adapt our machinery to its habits and turn it to account. It is useless to deplore the existence of habit in our own natures; the right course to take is to avail ourselves of its existence and turn it to a high purpose. The habit that leads a man to do evil things may be replaced by the habit that leads him to do good things, so that after a time it is easier for him to do good than to do evil.

The character is always weakest at the point at which it has once given way. The first offence is committed reluctantly, the second is committed without so hard a struggle, and each subsequent wrong is done more and more readily. Thus habits are formed and gain strength until they become like chains that bind us captive. On the other hand, the good thing we do may similarly become habitual, so that almost automatically we come to do the right as a matter of course. Hence the importance at the beginning of life of forming good habits, which become principles of conduct.

Character is neither more nor less than habit. It is what a man habitually does, what he is, that we recognize. We know him as a lazy, indolent, self-indulgent man, or as an alert, energetic, active man. Probably at the beginning, the former had no intention of degenerating, but the habit of postponing action, of deferring a duty, of avoiding the unpleasant, grew upon him, until his whole nature became weak and listless. So it is with habits of thought. A man may contract the habit of looking on the gloomy side of life, of taking a censorious and distrustful view of persons and things, until he becomes a misanthrope, and distrusts every one.

Good habits, too, may become evil by over-indulgence. We praise the careful, provident child, but he may become miserly, as the generous child may become improvident and reckless. The clean, tidy child may become a fop. The power of habit needs to be understood, and to be kept in control lest it becomes a tyranny from which escape is to be had only by a struggle that is hard and painful.

One of the hardest things in life is to break a bad habit. The habit of profanity, for example; the habit of lying, and of other sins. Once acquired, they are committed so easily that to overcome them is like rowing against the stream. Even in this effort, the power of habit comes to the assistance of the victim. It is harder for him to reform than it would have been to avoid the sin at the beginning; but he can form a good habit, which with every victory gains new power. Like cures like, and the persistence which fixed the habit upon him, aids him in shaking it off by persistence in acquiring a good habit.

People are often disappointed in their prayers for release from an evil habit. They expect that God will at once set them free without any effort of their own. There have been cases, especially with the habit of drinking, where he has done this; but, as a rule, no miracle is worked. The victim must work with God for his own deliverance. God will help him, and will give him strength, but he must fight out his battle himself. He must avoid the places and circumstances which tend to develop the habit and the trains of thought which lead to its indulgence, and he may be always sure that the reward to him that overcometh will be his in the end.

If You Want CASH

for your Real Estate or Business, I can get it, no matter what your property is worth or in what Town, City, State or Territory it is located.

I DO not expect to convince you by my advertising alone that I am better equipped to make a quick cash sale of your property than any other real estate man, but I DO expect to convince you that it will be to your advantage to write to me and tell me your requirements, so that I will have an opportunity to explain to you my business methods and submit a definite plan for converting your property into cash. The statements in the average advertisement are somewhat exaggerated; in many advertisements GREATLY exaggerated; but in some, simply plain statement of facts. Of course, I cannot expect you to believe that my ads. belong to the last-named class without giving you some tangible evidence. That is why I want you to send me a description of your property, so that I can tell you in a plain, straightforward manner just how I would handle it; how much commission I would charge you, and why I could, in all probability, sell it more quickly than any other real estate broker. I don't want you to simply take my word for ANYTHING. I want to give you POSITIVE PROOF of my ability before any agreement whatever is made between us.

If you want to buy any kind of a farm, home or business, in any part of the country, tell me your needs. I will guarantee to fill them promptly, and save you some money at the same time. Remember, that while you are writing me about buying or selling property, some one else may be writing me about the very thing that corresponds with your requirements.

DAUGHTER OF AUSTRIAN AMBASSADOR

THE CHRISTMAS TREE AT THE CHINESE LEGATION

DAUGHTER OF PERUVIAN MINISTER

Christmas in the Homes of the Diplomats

By WALDON FAWCETT

IN the homes of the foreign officials stationed at Washington, as the representatives of the various governments of the world, each year witnesses probably the oddest and most novel celebrations of Christmas to be found in the length and breadth of the land. Uncle Sam's official guests from every land and clime bring with them to our seat of government their own customs of commemorating the world's most joyous anniversary. It is a tribute, however, to the influence of the Republic that, while clinging in some measure to these transplanted ideas, many of them are adopting, in greater or less degree, the American form of the Christmas celebration.

Two influences are helping to Americanize Christmas in the homes of the diplomats at Washington. For one thing, there is an unusually large assemblage of children in the foreign colony at present. Many of these young folks attend American schools, and, inspired by the glowing tales of Christmas preparations at the homes of enthusiastic playmates, they are eager to have such example followed in their own homes. Another influence is that exerted by the American wives of diplomats. Seven or eight of the households in the diplomatic circle at Washington are now presided over by ladies of American birth, and it is, of course, only natural that they should retain their affection for the Christmas celebrations that were their delight in childhood.

The diplomatic Christmas festivity which possibly approaches most nearly to the American ideal is that at the German Embassy. In Germany, all the little folks believe in Santa Claus, and the children of the Teutonic diplomats at Uncle Sam's capital are not permitted to forget the legend of how the Christ-Child goes into every German home on Christmas Eve, and leaves a token of His love. A Bethlehem star crowns the Christmas tree at the German Embassy, and under its branches stands a wax figure representing the Saviour in the manger.

Christmas is, in France, a strictly religious festival, but the French Embassy at Washington, like the German, is now presided over by an American woman; consequently the day has been given a new meaning at this institution. Not content with one Christmas tree, Madame Jusserand, the wife of the French Ambassador, has three small Christmas trees, all gaily decorated, set in a row in the large drawing-room, opposite the immense painting portraying the surrender of Lord the great open fireplace in the dining-room, and the members of the Embassy family gather before the roaring fire and sing their Christmas carols.

Little Miss Hengelmuller, the only child of the Ambassador from Austria-Hungary and Baroness Hengelmuller, always has a most bountiful Christmas, receiving gifts from dozens of persons outside her own household. There are two Christmases at the Russian Embassy, but the real celebration comes on January 6.

An especially attractive Christmas tree is that at the Cuban Legation, and as a background for the gift-laden pine is a large silken flag—the one-starred emblem of the new Republic. In the homes of the Mexican representatives and other diplomats from our sister republics of Central and South America, a most interesting Christmas observance is followed, namely, the representation of the Nativity. One end of the largest room in the house is devoted to the purpose, and here is set up a representation in miniature of the city of Bethlehem, with its streets, houses and people. Over the whole is a canopy of stars, with the most prominent of all the Star of Bethlehem, shining over a grotto, in which are the tiny figures of the infant Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and the Three Wise Men.

The children from the Pan-American countries spend Christmas Day in visiting the homes of their playfellows in order to compare presents and see the miniature Bethlehems, which are, of course, different in every home.

A truly American Christmas is that at the Chinese Legation. Four of the little folks there—the children of Secretary Kwai and his American wife—were born in this country, and have always known the regulation American Christmas, with a tree and presents; but the two sons and one daughter of the new Chinese Minister had never heard of Christmas until they came here a year or two ago. However, their father, who was educated in this country, is a broad-minded man, and he encourages them to enter into the spirit of the American Christmas, and even helps to decorate the Christmas tree, which is each year erected in the big play-room in the basement of the new Chinese Legation.

The New Song

Sermon by Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

THE finest of pictures is yet to be painted. The most perfect sculpture is yet to be chiseled. The best of poems is yet to be penned. The sweetest and the most inspiring of songs is yet to be composed. We speak of the master-poets, artists, sculptors, and musicians, as though the poetical and artistic deeds of the past could never be excelled. This, however, is not true. Homer, and Virgil, and Scott, and Wordsworth, and Burns, and Tennyson, and Longfellow, and Lowell, and Poe, are master-poets to us, merely because their poems excel in beauty of expression, or delicacy of rhythm, or depth of thought, the productions of all other poets who have yet appeared. Raphael, and Michael Angelo, and Murillo, and Leonardo da Vinci, and Turner, are master-artists to us, merely because no artists have yet appeared who could approach them in perfection of form and glory of color. Beethoven, and Handel, and Bach, and Gluck, and Haydn, and Mozart, and Chopin, and Mendelssohn, and Wagner, are master-musicians to us, because they surpass all other musicians in perfection of harmony and grandeur of conception. No composers before them, and none since, have attained the mastery that they reach in their sublime art. But though these old master-musicians are masters to us, they were not masters to themselves. They struggled continually to give expression to higher and nobler conceptions, that they were never able to write. Even in their minds there were harmonies far better than those that they have given us. Their masterpieces fell far short of their ideals.

David the psalmist was a great musical composer. He always strove to originate new musical themes. If he could not compose new ones, then he wanted to hear what some one else had composed. The first time Mozart heard one of Bach's hymns played, he cried out in ecstasy, "Thank God, I learn something absolutely new." So David, again and again in his Psalms, cries out for something new in musical praise. We not only find the words of my text, "Sing unto the Lord a new song," in the Ninety-sixth Psalm, but we find them in the Ninety-eighth and in the One Hundredth and Forty-ninth, and we also find the same words in the book of Isaiah. The song they longed to hear will yet be sung in the heavenly land. The Seer of Patmos caught the echo of it as he listened to the New Song that no man could learn, but the host that had been redeemed and stood around the throne. What exquisite music it will be, we cannot conceive, but we know the theme that will inspire it. It is the theme of salvation, the incarnation of the Son of God, the coming to earth of that Divine Being whose birth among us we are about to celebrate. Let the same theme inspire our humble strains. Let us even now, as we meditate on that wondrous event, attune our hearts to that glorious harmony.

Our holiday song, in the first place, should be a cheerful song. It should not be sung in a minor key. It should not be a dirge or requiem, a lament, or a "Dead March in Saul." It should not be an antiphony for the matins of the dead. It should be joy on the wing. It should be the chorus of "Laughing Waters." It should be a hosannah, a hallelujah, a psalm, a doxology and a praise. Tears and sobs have no place in the New Song, which we should sing during our coming holiday season. What said David in reference to this new song? Make a sad song unto the Lord? No: In seven distinct places in the Psalms, the great singer of Israel cries, "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord." The first great essential of our coming Christmas song should be cheerfulness. We should hear it in every sound that is uttered. We should hear it in the loud notes. We should hear it in the soft notes as well.

Yes, the New Song we sing ought to have the keynote of cheerfulness—that is the first great essential. Why should it not be cheerful? If we believe in God, if we believe in what Christ has done for us, have not we a belief which should uplift every heart into the highest realms of Christian joy?

Our coming holiday song should sing the joy of our salvation. It must do more than that. It should sing about the happiness of some one else. Therefore, our

New Song should be a helpful song. Jenny Lind, the great "Swedish Nightingale" regarded her voice, as a gift from God, bestowed that she might help her fellow-men. May we look upon our New Song to be sung to God, as a song to help those who are in physical, mental, or spiritual distress.

Oh, that we, in our coming holiday song, could have the beautiful purpose which "the human thrush," Jenny Lind had in her gentle, consecrated Christian heart! She was always doing some kindness to others. Lablache, the great Italian basso, when he first heard her, said, "Her voice is so true, that each note is like a perfect pearl." Jenny Lind heard what her great Italian contemporary had said. When she met him at their first rehearsal, she smilingly stepped to his side, and took his hat; then placing her lips to its edge, she sang a beautiful French romance. Then she gave him back his hat, saying: "There, Monsieur Lablache, is your hat, filled with my pearls of song." That was a beautiful compliment by one great artist to another. But Jenny Lind did more than sing handfuls of musical pearls into Lablache's hat; she sang thousands of dollars out of the world's pocketbooks. Then she scattered thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars everywhere. She gave away thirty thousand florins when she made her triumphant musical tour through Germany. She gave to England's poor over $300,000, when this "Queen of Song" sang in the kingdom of her great sister, Queen Victoria. She gave $50,000 to America's poor when she traveled through our States. As Jenny Lind sang to her fellow-men and women a helpful song, so should we make our New Song of the holiday season a helpful song.

Your new holiday song. How is it to be made helpful to your fellow-men? Is it to be made so in a temporal sense? One day, Paganini the greatest violinist of the ages, was walking through the streets of Vienna. He was then at the height of his fame. He had kings and queens and nations bending under the sceptre of his bow. A celebrated musical composer, who was accompanying him, suddenly turned and pointed to a little ragged urchin scraping away on an old squeaky violin, "There, Paganini," said he, "is one of your countrymen." With that, Paganini crossed the street and began to talk with the little beggar. On hearing his tale of sorrow, the great Italian master snatched the squeaky fiddle from the boy's hand and began to play. Never did a public thoroughfare of Vienna hear such sublime music. After the piece was ended, Paganini passed his hat around through the crowd, and then emptied in the boy's pocket the gold and the silver he had collected, saying, "There, my lad, take that home to your mother and buy her the medicine she needs." During the coming Christmas holidays will our New Song be helpful one, in a temporal sense, as Paganini's was a blessing to the Vienna street arab? When you buy presents for your father and mother, wife or husband or child, brother and sister and friend, will your New Song inspire you also to buy bread for the hungry and clothing for the naked and medicine for the sick?

When we sing our New Song shall we bring spiritual blessings to others also? The great hosts which shall enter heaven, may be augmented if we sing our New Song as we ought to sing it. As you and I begin to join the redeemed multitudes, are we going with our friends? Shall not our New Song of Gospel love, fit to be sung by some invalid's bed to bring that sick man Christ? Shall it not be sung among the spiritual orphans, who never have bowed the knee at the Cross? Yes, my friends, our New Song should be a cheerful song, on account of our salvation. It should also be a helpful song, which will lead people to surrender their lives to the work of the Divine Master.

"Well," says one, "how can I sing a song of cheerfulness and of Gospel hope for myself for others, when everything seems to be going wrong in my own life? I feel just as did the writer of the One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Psalm. Then I was sadness and gloom to him. He seems to see the Jews huddled together in captivity. There he seems to gather them together, as the Jews to-day are gathered at the foot of Mount Moriah, at the 'Wailing Place' under the walls of the old Temple. Their captors cry to them and cry: 'Sing! sing! Sing as you used to sing in Jerusalem!' But they answer, 'How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land.' Then you say to me: 'This coming Christmas will find me in a strange land. Why,' you say, 'everything in my life is so different from what it used to be. So many of my loved ones are gone. My daughter was here last Christmas, she is gone now forever. Is it a mother's vacant chair, or father's, or a wife's, or a husband's? Yes, I have been a good giver to the grave, and that grave has taken the best I have. It is not the time for me to sing; it is time for sobs. Then I cannot give financially as I used to give. I have had many financial reverses during the past few months. Then I cannot do as I used to do for others. My own health is gradually breaking. How can I sing a New Song?

The great trouble with you is that when troubles come, instead of throwing yourselves more and more upon the divine strength, you have let go of God's strong hand and only depended on your own strength. After Jenny Lind's name had become famous as a singer, her voice began to fail. "Oh," said she to herself, "if I could only go and see Garcia, I know he would help me." Manuel Garcia was at that time the greatest musical developer of prima-donnas. She left Stockholm and went to Paris. As soon as she entered his studio and sang, Garcia said, "My good girl, you have no voice; or rather I should say you had a voice but you are now on the verge of losing it. Your organ is strained and worn out. The only advice I can offer is to recommend you not to sing a note for three months. At the end of that time, come to me I will see what I can do for you." That was good advice for Manuel Garcia to give to Jenny Lind, but it is not good advice for a Christian teacher to give you in reference to your learning how to sing the New Song of Christ. When you need is not rest, not retirement, not seclusion; you need to practice your Gospel throat. You need to learn how to sing the New Song by delving deep in the promises of God, and then by singing God's promises your own life and to the lives of all around you. Sing! Sing! Keep on singing! Sing forth the promises of God! Sing what he has done for others! Sing about what he has done and will continue to do for you!

But lastly, I assert that our New Song for the coming holidays should be a triumphant song. In it we should hear the ring of the coming conquest of the world.

*Text, Psalm 96: 1. "O, sing unto the Lord a new song."

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

It began the evening before, and lasted until midnight of Thanksgiving Day. Hundreds of men and boys were fed and cheered by the good food and hearty sympathy extended to them on this day of all others, even the wanderer, no matter how callous and hardened may seem, grows homesick and heartsick, as he thinks the time when he had a happy home circle and a loving family.

As he walks up and down the streets of New York, out of work, out of friends, and out at the elbows, is it any wonder that he grows more discouraged, as he sees the risk preparations, the happy marketers and shoppers with joyous faces and well-filled purses, laying in their stock of good things for the annual Thanksgiving. The shop-windows and sidewalk displays at the markets are tempting enough to a hungry man at any time; but especially so to the unfortunate, who, by the most thorough search, cannot find a nickel or even a penny in his various cluttered and empty pockets.

To six hundred such youths and boys the Bowery Mission opened its hospitable doors on Thanksgiving Eve.

At eight o'clock P. M. the large audience hall was packed, while on the platform every available spot was filled with visitors and with the never-weary mission workers, who at this season have to do double duty, and do it willingly and cheerfully. Out in the hall when they had worked for hours making up and packing the baskets which were to be given out to this young army after an hour's entertainment.

The meeting was opened by Mr. Hallimond, the genial superintendent, who never forgets, in dealing with "Young America" that he was once a boy himself, and he is not yet entirely gotten over it. He won the hearts of the youngsters by telling them that they must keep quiet while the various entertainers were reciting, singing, etc., but—and here every face lighted up and every one braced up to do his best—between each number he would make just as much noise as he wanted to! Was ever such a privilege given before to such a crowd?

And do you suppose they took advantage of it? Let one who has been there and heard assure you that six hundred boys, brought up to the nurture and admonition of the streets of New York, can make most tremendous noise. Lungs, hands and hands united and did their best, and if there is anything more shrill than his whistle when a boy puts his mouth with his fingers, and this is multiplied by a hundred, it is yet to be discovered. What a night it was for the boys, and let it be said to their credit that this deafening, ear-splitting racket was indulged in only at the times designated. The raising of a hand by the Superintendent was sufficient for every boy to become quiet.

Let no one think that the little newsboys, boot-blacks and other "gamins" of New York, do not know how to behave themselves when occasion demands.

What a sea of boyish faces confronted the visitors upon the platform. A ragged little army it was, composed of almost every type of boy, from the golden-haired, blue-eyed Irish lad to the ebony-skinned, dreamy-eyed descendant of Abraham. All colors and complexions, some with merry faces, others with eyes that seemed backed with unshed tears. Poor little, pale, pinched cheeks, and claw-like fingers told only too plainly of scanty fare and fireless homes. Many of these little ones did not open their dinner boxes, but took them home to share them with mother and the other children who were ill, or too small to come.

When the last boy had gone, the last cup of coffee had disappeared, and the last box had been given out, it was almost time for the preparations for the early breakfast, which begins at one and ends at three A. M., when one thousand homeless and bedless men and boys are fed the standing room in the Mission. The guests this time were men. Only the good Father knows the tragedies in the lives of these men which had brought them there; and on this delightful occasion it was not seemly to lift the veil or to look behind the pitiful attempts of many of these unfortunates to put aside for the time their trials and sufferings, and enter into the joy of the occasion. This meeting was one of the most blessed that was ever held within those four walls, and many a heart enshrouded in its own darkness must have seen the star of hope arise.

Mrs. Bird gave her "boys" a welcome in her own motherly way. Superintendent Hallimond went down among his "brothers" and offered up a simple, heartfelt prayer to the All-Father before introducing Dr. Louis Klopsch, who was obliged to stand silent for some minutes before the tumult of welcome subsided.

Dr. Klopsch spoke in a most helpful and encouraging vein, and cited many instances where men both good and great had arisen from the most discouraging circumstances and surroundings, to places of trust and honor—men whose names would never be forgotten by a grateful world, which had benefited so much by their work, their warm hearts and keen intellects. The sound common sense of honesty, sobriety and right living, which were possible for all who would place their lives and hearts in the keeping of a loving God, was presented by the speaker in unmistakable terms, and in a way which must have impressed his hearers with his sincerity, and of his knowledge whereof he spoke. This thoroughly practical talk, backed up as it was by the substantial tokens of his care, which awaited these men in the back room, must have been a great uplift to them.

There were many beautiful hymns sung, and solos by a number of men, whose sweet, rich voices gave no hint of the time when they were down among the hungry throng, friendless and discouraged until they found salvation and redemption in the Bowery Mission. Rev. Dr. McPherson spoke very feelingly, and then after a benediction, the men filed singly into the back room, where a similar scene to that of twenty-four hours before was enacted, only that the actors were men; young men and old, stalwart and feeble, men of many types, some of whom had, perhaps, not tasted food before during the day.

If the readers who contributed to this Thanksgiving dinner fund could have looked upon that scene, their hearts would have been more than gladdened, that they were having a share in doing so much real good, and in giving so much cheer to a day which otherwise would have been one of sadness and suffering to many homeless men of the Bowery.

with hot coffee and rolls. When this was over, after a little respite, the women and children who had received cards of invitation came for the family dinner baskets, each of which was packed with a good substantial Thanksgiving dinner, to be cooked at home. One hundred of these were given out. At eight o'clock P. M., a great crowd again assembled, filling every seat and all Christ. In it we should know not only that man, an individual, will be saved, but that there shall come a time when nations and peoples of all climes shall worship our Christ. In our New Song, we want to catch a glimpse of the power of God. Here and there, temporarily, one of God's disciples may seem to be driven back, but after all, the great march of the Christian army is forward. We are all marching on to a Millennium Day, when Christ, as the leader of the great army of Victory, shall have his standards above every land, waving over every nation and over every sea. Our New Song should be a triumphant song.

Would to-day I might convince you of the sureness of Christ's conquest over all the nations of the world, as vividly as that great dramatic preacher, William Lawson, brought it before his London hearers, nearly a century ago. He was a man of most remarkable personality. He had an imagination all aglow and on fire.

With the power of a mighty word-painter, he was describing the conquest of the world. He portrayed a grand procession marching before Christ, the Prophet, Priest and King, in a coronation pageant. First came the prophets, the priests and the apostles; then the martyrs, row after row, line after line, army after army. Then, after all the redeemed dead had marched past, there came the living. First came the earthly princes and princesses and nobles. Then there marched forth millions upon millions of the human race. Then after he had wheeled into line all generations of all times, and all principalities and powers, the great Methodist preacher suddenly stopped. Then in stentorian tones he commenced to sing that grand old hymn of Edward Perronet:

All hail the power of Jesus name,
Let angels prostrate fall.
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all.

So powerful was the effect, so overwhelming was the impression of the coming conquest of Christ over the world, that the great audience sprang to its feet and took up the refrain and sang it louder and louder and louder, until the very heavens seemed to shake. Oh, my friends, cannot you feel that our New Song for the coming Christmas holidays should be a triumphant one?

When the musical leader in the old village choir loft, before the organ and the piano had forced their way into the church edifices, wanted to start the hymn, he would strike his tuning-fork and lift it to his ear. For the New Song of the coming Christmas holidays, I would strike the tuning-fork of hope and life and eternal conquest through Christ. May the same angel which sang over the Christmas manger, sing for us to-day over that rifled tomb a New Song of salvation for a dying world, and a conquest for Christ of all peoples in this world.

Bright Children of the Mountains

15 MILES OVER MOUNTAINS THIS WAY

IN certain parts of the Appalachian range of mountains, also in the Ozarks, there are many homes where the old-fashioned spinning-wheel and hand-loom are still used, the farmers raising their own wool and flax, from which they make homespun garments and all the linen for household use. Coal is found sufficient for family use in the immediate vicinity of some of these homes, only a few feet below the surface and easily obtained. They are far from the railroad, and a considerable portion of the people have never seen a train of cars, or even heard the locomotive whistle. Their material needs are few, beyond what they can obtain from their simple farming, or secure through barter at the nearest cross-roads store. Newspapers and magazines are rarely seen; even Bibles are scarce.

Our American Sunday School Union missionaries are always welcomed. They supply the families with special literature prepared for their use. In this way, the spelling-book and primer are found in many a home, and are much appreciated. The mountain children have good memories. They will repeat not only the Golden Text, but very often the entire Sunday

WITH FEW ADVANTAGES, THEY HAVE WONDERFUL MEMORIES FOR SCRIPTURE LESSONS

School Lesson. When review Sunday comes, they are ambitious for copies of the New Testament, given as prizes by the missionary, for excellence in repeating the Golden Texts of the entire quarter, and the chief points in the lessons for the three months.

The cabin-homes of these mountain dwellers are made of unhewn logs, and the chimneys of rock and stone. Mud or mortar, with sticks, is used to hold the chimney together and to fill the spaces between the logs, keeping out wind and storms. Mills for grinding corn or wheat are run by water-power with the old-fashioned overshot wheel. Abraham Lincoln, when a lad, often carried grist to the mill on horseback.

In some sections, like West Virginia, the schools are far better and more in number than farther South, and the people are thrifty and intelligent; but even there, in the mountain country, there is abundant room for Christian work, as the people are scattered and are at a distance from the church privileges enjoyed in towns and villages. The following extracts from missionary letters illustrate the character of the work that is being done by the A. S. S. U. in these sections:

"At a schoolhouse on the southern slope of a mountain," writes one missionary, "a big gathering of schools took place last Saturday—a crowd from four settlements filled the shady grove. A week before that, a similar meeting was held at a new chapel in another section. Five schools were represented there. A boy in this place, who works on his mother's garden for part of the vegetables, came to this meeting, toting a basket of green peas six miles. 'Please, sir,' said he, 'I want to buy a Bible for my own self. Would you let me have one for all these yer peas?' 'Gladly will I do so,' was my response. A happier lad could not be seen in that big crowd listening to the addresses."

"One Sunday I met a group of small boys," says another letter, "and I said: 'Boys, do you go to Sunday School?' 'We are not of that kind of stuff,' was the reply. 'When you get to be men, you may wish you had gone to Sunday School.' 'That is too much sugar for a cent,' answered one of the boys. A little later I visited a godless home. A young man about fourteen came in. 'Have you a Bible?' I asked. 'A Bible? No, I ain't got no Bible.' 'Let me sell you one.' 'I don't want it.' 'Do you like to read stories?' 'You bet—if they are good uns.' I told him of Joseph in his country and city life, of David and Goliath. The young man was delighted. 'What's thaten about?' pointing to a red-covered Testament. 'That is a love-story.' And I told him of the love of God. His heart melted. I organized a school in that place."

In a letter recently received from a missionary, the following occurs:

"Having organized a school about twelve miles from this one, I decided to visit them last Sunday morning. The school had opened when I arrived, and I found more than a hundred people in the house and on the grounds, most of them taking an active interest in the work. Two classes attracted my special attention, one a class of twenty-eight boys and girls learning their letters, and the other of twenty-three, just beginning to read a little, using the First Reader, in books published by the American Sunday School Union. These children were sitting on the grass under two big oak trees, and apparently as intent and interested as they well could be. This back-country school now has an enrollment of ninety."

"In March 1899 I organized a school in a country schoolhouse about six miles from this latter place. In one of the classes was a little girl, nine years of age, who took great interest in her lessons. Her teacher said three years after that she had never missed a question. After a year or so, she taught the lesson to very busy mother, whose household consisted of nine children. Last November the family moved to the neighborhood referred to above, and she was one of the first to suggest a Sunday School. In organization she was selected to teach of the advanced classes, though not of fourteen years old. She has committed and recited the four Gospels and a twenty chapters of the Acts of the Apostles. She says she intends to commit the whole New Testament. I asked her work she did at home, and learned she milks two cows morning and evening, helps her mother cook the family meals, washes the dishes, and spins ten to twelve 'cuts' on the 'big wheel' daily.

"Most of the mountain children are without good books and papers or any clothes, but many of them, in fact, more than, are bright-faced, intelligent children. A nickel puts a testament, a primer, First Reader in their possession, and it does delight them."

THE WORKER AT THE GATE

IN one of his sermons, the Rev. Wm. J. Dawson, the famous London preacher, who is now visiting and speaking in this country, introduces a beautiful allegory, which we reproduce from the Brooklyn Eagle. In dream or vision, the preacher is led by a guide through a land of mountains and rocks, crags and ravines. They hear the sound of marching feet, the clang of iron, the stroke of hammers upon a thousand anvils. Beside them walks a strange shape. "He is Labor," said the guide, "and thou goest to the judgment of the workers."

"The man's brow was deeply seamed, and the muscles of his body were like knotted steel; sweat and grime defiled him, and his flesh was scarred; yet there was something noble in his mighty bulk, and the dull patience of his face made me marvel, for marred though the brow was, yet was it majestic. Upon his back were slung the weapons of his toil, and the very hills seemed to know him as their conqueror. For upon such peaks as these this man had moved in weariness and hunger, and in their depths he had cut the path which the vulture's eye hath not seen, nor the lion's whelp trodden. With the muscles of his hand he had overturned the mountains and grappled with the stones of darkness, and bound the water-floods from overflowing. His voice had cried to the live lightning, 'Come,' and it came, and behold it was as some bright and dreadful creature of the forest, tamed to human uses, and lying at his feet with glittering, obedient eyes. The wind had called him brother, and to him had the blind and turbulent ocean been submissive. Time, looking on the works which he had wrought, wondered, and before them the spirit of Havoc had stood still and was dismayed. Yet had this man before whom the depths were stirred, moved among his fellows in coarse raiment and with humble feet, eating frugal bread and dwelling beneath mean roofs of populous poverty, unconsidered and contented, and having no beauty that men should desire him.

"Now, as we went, the way grew ever narrower and the air darker, until at last we came to a place where two monstrous gates of iron towered into the sky, and beside them stood two great angels. And straightway the angels began to talk with the man.

"And one said, 'Who art thou?' And he replied, 'I am a worker.' 'Tell us of thine earthly life,' they said. And the man replied, 'There is nothing to be told. I was but one among a multitude. I rose in the chill of dawn, went out, toiled through many hours, and came back to sleep. The frosts pierced me, the rains smote upon me; yet was there joy in it all, for the work of my hands stood fast. One day of the week I rested, and then I slept from morn till night, for I was weary. One dwelt with me; many-childed, labor-spent was she, and her I loved. The children of my loins grew up, but they were as strange children, for I saw them only for a little on the one day, and then, being bone-weary and heavy of eye,

I slept. That was my life,' he said, sadly.

"'Did'st thou ever look beyond the earth, or hear of what men had written in books of that beyond?'

"'I had no time. Moreover, I could not read nor write.'

"'Did'st thou never pray?'

"'Aye, often. When the ship went down and the black water spued me out; when the bead of fire leapt along the fuse, and the mine thundered in, then I called on God. But I could not pray in churches. The air choked me; and beside I felt no need.'

"'Hast thou aught of good in thy earthly life?'

"'I built well—that was good. The trains rush upon the ways I made—the road holds fast. The rivets of the bridge I built are firm, and the floods rage about its base in vain. When the trains roar past my rivets cry to one another, 'Hold fast, brothers, the shock comes,' and something in me feels their jar and ring, and triumphs.'

"'But didst thou do no good to thy fellow, no act that made thee think of him before thyself?'

"'As such things happen, I did them. Among men such as I am, other things beside cold and heat are shared.'

"'Let me see thine hand,' said the angel. But at that word the man thrust his hand behind him, and stood shamefaced. 'Nevertheless, let me see it,' said the angel, speaking very softly.

"The man held out his huge hand, blushing like a child. It was gnarled and knotted like a lump of oak. A great ran across it, and it was broken at the wrist.

"'How came this?' said the angel.

"'It was nothing,' said the man.

"'Of us had to go when the crash came, the other chap was young and kept his mother. I couldn't let him die, not knowing it. The best hour I ever knew when I lay there smashed and heard he was safe. But it's not worth talking of—he'd ha' done the same for me.'

"At that word the vast gates of began to move and a strange music began from their hinges as they turned. And hold, beyond them, rose the vision of a city wonderful to see; for a thousand aqueducts and arches hung in midair, the dome rose above dome, and parapet above parapet; and against this blue limit of things scaffoldings were swung, gleaming with many lights, and a forest of pillars like intertangled spars of crystal; so that I knew that this was one of God's cities that was still being built. And the man's eyes shone as he looked, for he had never seen building such as this, and the vision of work cried in his heart. 'Thou art where I would be,' he said. 'It was to find work down below of late; but see there's plenty of work to be had here. And I think I see my boys upon the shining scaffolds.'

"And the angel said, 'Pass in; thy joy is work, and enter thou into the city of thy Lord. The Maker calls thee.'

"And the man, wondering much, passed on, and the gates were shut."

Little Tours in Upper Assam

NATIVES WASHING THE MISSIONARIES' HANDS

REMEMBER writing a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD just as I had begun mission work in the Dibrugarh district here in Upper Assam. About the same time, Rev. O. L. Swanson began his remarkable work here in the Golaghat district. Now, after a pause of some few years, let us look back and what has been the result: First, the Gospel has been preached in towns and villages, to individuals, to groups, thousands at a time, by means of pictures, magic lanterns, "wordless books," and in many other ways. Thousands of copies of the Written Word, in six or seven different languages, have been sold, until at the present day there is scarcely a market, tea-garden, town or village in all this region where Christ has not been named. This has meant many hardships, much travail, much opposition on the part of European nominal Christians, and much positive outspoken opposition on the part of Mohammedans. It has meant sacrifice and much more to the missionary and his native helpers. The most degraded and degraded class of men and women in all upper Assam have "believed the report," not by scores, but by hundreds. Scarcely a week passes without a number of these people openly confessing Christ in baptism. Many of these men, who are looked down upon by the educated Hindu, the bigoted Mohammedan, and some Europeans, have looked at the Cross, and have become sons and daughters of the King. From a very small beginning in 1898, there is now an ingathering of some 850 souls, and an organization of twenty-four churches; besides the building of chapels, the establishment of schools, and the practical training of native helpers. Many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be interested in the details of an ordinary day's work in the cool or touring season: I may be at a government Rest-House, or in my tent, or at a tea-planter's bungalow. I get up early, call my native helpers for a council, announce the plan for the day, and make all the time-saving arrangements I can.

Sunday, at about 10 A.M., we have a meeting of those who have been asking for baptism. We explain to them the requirements. Then we have prayer and a short exhortation. After the noonday meal, we gather at some clear stream or large pond, where usually a large crowd of people assemble to "see the missionary turn the heathen into Christians," as they say. This is often a good opportunity for preaching to heathen, many of whom are "almost persuaded." This done, we read from the New Testament, sing a suitable hymn, and pray. The new Christians walk into the water, one by one, and are baptized, while hymns are sung by those on the bank. Afterward there is a service held for some one of the nearest Christian centres. If there are any weddings, or if the Lord's Supper is to be administered, these come after the service. Wedding certificates are always made out in duplicate, one copy being given to the bride and the other kept for the government. We have a custom of shaking hands with one another, saying as we do so, "Yesu sohai" (that is, "Jesus helps"), at the end of the service; then the meeting breaks up, and the people go away very quietly and contentedly to their homes.

If there is a market which we can reach before the people leave, we take a roll of Sunday School pictures, tracts, Gospels, etc., and go to a convenient place and begin another service, by holding up our pictures and singing hymns. We soon gain the attention of the people. Sometimes there are thousands present, and they press around us until we scarcely have room to move about. Market preaching in Assam always calls

BAPTIST MISSIONARIES IN UPPER ASSAM

After a few hours spent in preaching and in answering questions, we sell as many books as we can. It is wonderful how much of this kind of work one can do, and not know that he is tired until he sits down in his tent. A cup of tea and some rest till dark; then, if the manager of the nearest tea-garden has no objections, the worker takes his magic lantern into the coolie lines—having previously given notice—and prepares for an outdoor talk on the Life of Christ. Generally a very large crowd of all classes assembles and listens. An appeal to the audience to forsake idols and false religions, and to believe in Christ, will often lead some to decide then and there. Others treat the subject with reverence, but go no further, and yet others thank us for our kindness, but treat the whole affair as a sort of a show and pass on with a hardened heart.

It may now be nine or ten o'clock. Perhaps, after a mile or two or more to walk, we have dinner, and retire for the night, certain that God's Word will not return unto Him void.

Other classes besides the coolies are giving heed to the Gospel. One meets with a large number amongst the educated, who are "almost ready," but it is the "common people who hear him gladly."

Our people, now numbering about 1,775 Christians in Upper Assam, are organized into an association, which meets by delegation annually, and has a profitable time. This year, a Bible School has been started at Nowgong, for the training of native helpers. A native ministry is one of our greatest needs at the present time.

There are many signs that the enlightenment which comes through education, as well as the direct influences of the Gospel, is weakening the faith of thousands in the efficacy of idol-worship and other false religious works. We are laboring in confidence that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our God.

for the use of two or more languages. Usually the missionary begins the preaching; then, one after another, the native preachers speak for a few minutes at a time. If the missionary sees any new Christians standing in the crowd, he may ask them to speak.

Training Girls in the Orient

WITH every passing year, the American College for Girls in Constantinople has more applications from graduates of the American mission schools in Bulgaria and Turkey than it can accept. Students of these schools having sufficient ambition, ability and perseverance to complete the high school course, are in many ways the best prepared young women of the country, for a college education.

Many of them begin immediately to teach in native or American schools, and soon find their need of further study. But as they are generally poor, and as they often agree to teach at very small salaries in the school that has educated them, they have no means of paying college fees.

The American College for Girls is organized on the basis of receiving pay for its students, and is not in a position to receive these students, who would be the best material it could take. A small scholarship fund enables the college to offer aid to a student or two, in each of the four leading nationalities represented in the school. This year, as usual, the demand has come for scholarships for students from the interior of Turkey and Bulgaria, who, after leaving the college, are longing for a better education to enable them to teach their own people. Sometimes a good student waits several years before the scholarship fund or a benevolent friend of education in the East makes it possible for her to enter. More often she gives up the attempt to get the money.

There are few ways in which one hundred and fifty dollars could be put to better use than by giving a year's education at the American College to a student who has had some little experience of the American education in the East, and who is in a position to appreciate deeply and to profit richly by a course that has been planned carefully to meet the moral, intellectual and religious needs of the women of the East.

Any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is interested in the work, and who would welcome an opportunity to educate an Oriental girl, may address Dr. Mary M. Patrick, Principal, American College for Girls, Constantinople, Turkey, British Post-Office, who will gladly give all necessary information.

How Porto Rico Keeps Christmas

THE real Christmas Day in Porto Rico is January 6th, Twelfth-Day, Epiphany or Three Kings' Day, at least in so far as that part of it which pertains to the exchanging of gifts and remembrances is concerned. The day looked forward to by children of all Christian countries during the year, comes twelve days late in Porto Rico. The native children of this beautiful green little garden-island of Uncle Sam, have no story of Santa Claus, but their mothers tell them one which makes them just as happy. On the morning of Three Kings' Day, all the good little boys and girls get up with the sun, to find the presents which were left in the night, not by a snow-covered Santa Claus, but by the Three Wise Men from the East.

The Porto Rico mother, the night before Three Kings' Day, tells the children of the visit of the Magi, and its significance. "And when the Three Wise Men got down from their donkeys and went inside the house," she narrates, "and saw the dear little Child, they fell on their knees and worshiped him, and left heaps and heaps of dulces (sweets), and toys, and everything which only the Wise Men know how to select for children. Ever since, on this same night, every year (says the legend), those same Wise Men travel over this island, and whenever they come to a house where a good child lives, they leave a present and pass on.

"Now, let me see if the breakfast for their mules is all right," she adds, as she steps out on the balcony, where there is a small box (or maybe a pair of shoes, or an old hat) filled with fresh-pulled grass. It has been placed there early in the evening by the children, under instructions from their parents or the servants, who, hundreds of times during the year, have told the story of Caspar, Melchior and Balthasar, who travel so far on vispera, or the night before Three Kings' Day. "The three mules," they have been told, "will be very tired and hungry after carrying los tres santos reyes (the Three Wise Kings) so far, and you must fix some grass for them to eat. If you are a good little boy all the year the mules will stop and eat all the grass and the Kings will put an aguinaldo (present) in the box in place of the grass." The Porto Rico legend certainly is poetical. Its simplicity adds a certain degree of realism to the narrative, and it certainly appeals to the infant mind as impressively, or more so, as the story of Santa Claus, which has no Bible foundation in truth. When a Porto Rican youngster is fretful and "bad," its mother doesn't say, "If you don't be good Santa Claus will forget you." She says: "The mules of the Three Kings will be angry and won't stop at our house, and Melchior, the black king, will get you."

On January 5th, every child in San Juan gathers its box full of grass to leave on the balcony. The city is so compactly built that grass grows only in a very few places. There are two small plots on the Marina, near where the steamers land, and also at Plaza Colon, and these places are soon bare, the hundreds of children having plucked every blade.

A few years ago, the American Protestant Mission in the island delighted their young converts by exhibiting real Christmas trees, and even with a school inspector disguised as Santa Claus. The Christmas tree continues to be a favorite feature at the Protestant churches, and although the Three Kings are better liked, no objection is made, as Santa Claus comes on December 25th, while the Kings arrive January 6th. Those children who have Santa too, are doubly fortunate, but the vast majority of the island's children know nothing of the jolly fat Saint from the icy north.

December 25th, here, as everywhere, is observed as the anniversary of the birth of the Saviour, with appropriate church services, and the customary family reunion at dinner. The native Christmas dinner among the better classes consists of pavo (turkey), and the usual array of vegetables; but in the great majority of cases, particularly in country towns and plantations, the dinner table is graced by a whole roasted young pig. The pig is fattened from the day of his birth until the morning of the day on which he is eaten. He is then killed, and dressed, and stuffed with meats and spices. A pole ten or twelve feet long is run through the carcass lengthwise. Meantime a wood fire has been built, and a forked stick driven into the ground near the fire.

PREPARING THE FEAST OF ROAST-PIG

One end of the pole upon which the spice-stuffed pig is spitted, is rested on the Y-shaped stick. The pig is suspended over the fire, and the native cook holds the other end of the pole. He continuously turns the pig until the meat is cooked. New spices and flavoring blends are added frequently. The process takes about two hours. Then the pole is removed, and the lechon is put on a big platter, and smothered with a dozen sorts of queer vegetables.

More alms are distributed between Christmas and Twelfth Day than at any other time. Each household the day one meets parrandas, or parties of both sexes, young and old, who travel from street to street and house to house, singing hymns and verses praising Jesus, Mary and the Three Kings. The verses are set to music, which seems to be partly Indian, partly Moro-Spanish, with a strain of the Oriental. The singers play an accompaniment on tiros and cuatros, or native guitars and guitarras. They accept offerings of money, clothing, or food and drink. One member of a parranda composed of a small boy and girl of seven or eight years, quavered singing little verses with thin, pipy voice and strumming on miniature guitars.

The three Saint-Kings
Travel on horseback,
One red,
One black and one bay.

The three Saint-Kings,
Blessed be God!
They go and come again,
But we do not.

Then they will hold out their little hands, and look up at you with sad, black eyes, and a plaintive agradecido, senor (present, sir), that is irresistible. Some of the verses, in fact more than others, are nonsense, especially when given in English literally. Some are direct appeals to one's vanity. Don Juan and his wife may be awakened at daylight with a song sung by a dozen untrained voices to the accompaniment of tiros and guichas, the latter being hollowed gourds, roughened, which are scraped in time, producing a swish-like, rasping sound.

The honorable Juan
And his beautiful wife,
He is a pink
And she is a rose!

As the festive season draws near a close, on January 5th, or vispera, there is a grand rush of townsfolk to the country. It is quite impossible on the 5th to find a horse in San Juan. One meets on the roads, entire families in canvas-covered ox-carts and in vehicles of every description, bound for the plantations, where the yearly reunion takes place. One of the chief delicacies eaten in the way of a dulce (in the country districts, this time is pastilea, fried cake made of banana flour, and stuffed with choice bits of pork, raisins, olives, and garlic, among other things. A sort of flour cake, called arepas, is another delicacy; it is made in various curious shapes, wrapped in heavy banana leaves and baked on top of the stone charcoal stove. Alfajores are another cake of a similar sort. There is also no end of dulces of cocoa, oranges, and other fruits.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, the fact remains that the Porto Ricans are a happy, contented people, and that they thoroughly appreciate and enjoy the Christmas festival, which, instead of lasting two or four hours, is continued for half that number of days.

CHRISTMAS ON THE CONGO

WE had been at Luebo, in the heart of the Congo Free State, Africa, less than a year.

We were ten thousand miles from home, in the heart of heathendom; the people had not the slightest idea of civilization; they were dirty, degraded, wicked. Their only desire was for something to eat, a place to sleep, and a small piece of cloth to wear. They had no love for one another, they fought and killed, and ended their wars with a cannibal feast. The word, "love," was unknown in their vocabulary. The children appealed to us more as animals than as human. What, then, had Christmas in their minds? However, the matter was talked over, the objections met, and the decision was made that Santa Claus should be invited to come! Word was sent to him to come at home his fur coat and big mittens, and to don, in place of them, a white duck suit and a white helmet.

We had on our station about two hundred natives, men, women and children, who were working for us, and we confined our dinner to them, hoping it would prove an object-lesson to the hoards of untamed savages that swarmed in the surrounding woods.

Messengers were sent to the country in search of wild boars; others to buy cassava; still others for chickens, peanuts, bananas, palm-sweet potatoes and palm-nuts. These, of course, we had for.

Early on the morning of Christmas Day, the preparations were begun. The boars were killed and cut up into pieces and placed into clay pots—of which there were a quantity made by the Baka people near us—and boiled over open fires. The cassava was cut up into puddings, native fashion, each about as large as a man's head, and resembling, in texture, unbaked bread or dough; the taste, putty mixed with oil. Each pudding was dipped in the yellow-colored palm-oil before cooking. There being no conveniences for roasting the chickens, they also were boiled and divided into portions. Ears of green corn, wet and succulent, were roasted in their natural coverings; the peanuts were pounded fine in the big native mortars, and then mixed with palm-oil and plenty of wild pepper, and moulded into cakes.

The people seated, pots of savory meat were placed in the centre of each group; around these in grand display were placed ears of corn, peanuts, sweet potatoes and palm-oil. No tablecloth covered the ground, no knives nor spoons lent themselves to decoration, but there was plenty of food, and restless, hungry people. We had told them that no one was to eat until all were served, and until a blessing was asked. At last the supreme moment came. With hands uplifted one of the missionaries, in broken African dialect, invoked the blessing, and then the signal was given. But the missionaries were not prepared for what was to follow. No sooner had the signal passed than, with a yell that would have put a Comanche Indian to shame, every native made a dive for a pot of meat—a pack of famished dogs let loose in a kennel with one bone could not have created more havoc. In a moment, clay pots were smashed, peanuts were scattered, potatoes were ground into the dirt, faces were scratched, hands were cut, clothing was torn off, and the hearts of the missionaries were almost broken. Men and women and children fought for pieces of meat, and pandemonium reigned. Never were peace and quiet and anticipated joy so suddenly destroyed. Words were useless; threats lost in the air. We were forced to gather ourselves together and leave the scene.

We stayed. The years rolled on. Ten of them, years filled with hopes and fears, trials and disappointments,—and hard work also. And now another Christmas day is drawing near. Not all of the first little band of missionaries are present; some have passed away to be forever with the Christ in whose honor the feast is celebrated. The same sun is shining, the same perfume scents the air. But how changed is all the rest! In the centre of the compound, on the very spot where the first Christmas dear boys and girls at Mont-Lawn.

LITTLE NATIVE PLAYER

ON THE PLAZA OF THE MISSIONARY'S HOME

And how was this change wrought? you ask. Well, it means a tale of ten long years of weariness and trial. Then, too, sickness and death came to the little band. The deadly African fever lurked in every corner of each home. Soon the band of missionaries was reduced from six to two. For a time my wife and I were left alone in the heart of Africa. Insects swarmed in vast numbers; flying roaches, as large as humming-birds, held nightly carnival in the houses; the white ants entered our dwellings to eat up all the woodwork, as well as the clothing. Once in a while, a python, ten to fifteen feet long, would draw its mighty body, like a few lengths of animated stove-pipe, over our mission grounds.

Discouraged by the lack of interest on the part of the natives, wearied out by their fights with ignorance and superstition and filthiness, the missionaries were about to give up, and indeed the home committee thought seriously of withdrawing from the field, when one Sunday morning, six natives were baptized into the church.

In front of the pulpit stood the little table, with the chalice and plates, the wine and the bread, covered with the whitest of linen. Around the table gathered the six natives, who less than a year before had been heathens of the heathen—unkempt, dirty, cruel, and wicked; fighting with each other, and partaking of human flesh at their feasts, but who now were clothed and in their right minds, and with a glow on their dusky faces wonderful to behold. Surely they had been "brought up out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and their feet set upon a rock."

And so the church grew, and when the Christmas day came, there was a church of over two thousand members—earnest, true Christian men and women.

(Missionary) D. W. C. SNYDER.

PREPARING THE CHRISTMAS FEAST IN CONGO-LAND

was held, stands a church. The night before Christmas, after all the black eyes had closed in slumber, lights could have been seen inside the sacred walls, strange forms passing from house to church, as the missionaries helped old Santa Claus bring in his bundles.

Early Christmas morning, all was life again, but orderly, peaceful life. At ten o'clock, the church bell tolled out its joyous sound, and from the various paths leading from the homes of the people, came men, women and children, dressed in gay calicoes and white muslins. Very orderly they enter the church; very quietly and with becoming decorum they seat themselves on the rude but serviceable benches, politely reserving the first row for the visiting traders, who had been invited. The platform was still empty, save that space where the portable organ stood, and around this were gathered a few natives, while on the organ-stool sat a little native girl, only eight years old, her hands ready to touch the keys. The music you would have recognized, but the words were in the native tongue. Then a missionary offers prayer, while each head bends in true devotion. A programme is then worked out—a chorus, sung by the whole school, opens the entertainment. Songs and recitations, with a well-executed drill by some boys dressed as soldiers, follows. The instrumental solo on the harmonium by the little girl of eight is particularly appreciated. But the most interesting part of the programme to most of the audience is headed: "Good Things From Santa Claus." At a given signal, a big palm tree, laden with presents and decked with ornaments and as beautiful as any in the home-land, is disclosed. Everyone keeps his seat until his name is called, and what funny names,—Kapinga,

The Spirit of Christmas

IN reading the story of the first Christmas morning, one is struck with the extreme simplicity of the narrative. The most important event in the whole world's history had occurred, yet how quietly. The Son of God had been clothed with humanity, and had come into the world because "God so loved the world." The beginning of such a stupendous plan of salvation would seem worthy of all glory and pomp which the earth could afford; a palace for the birth-place of the Child, purple and fine linen for his robing, and a jeweled cradle for his bed. All the softness and beauty which riches could buy and mother-love suggest, would seem appropriate surroundings for this most precious Babe, whose birth was the incarnate hope of the world.

In this day of many-sided luxury, when so many people are losing sight of everything else in the wild scramble for wealth and the power it brings, it is good to go back to that story, so simply and sweetly told, of the first Christmas. There was no room at the inn, and all the place that the sweet young mother could find was in a stable, and the first cradle for her Glorious Son was a manger. But the mother knew—and there was no murmuring in her heart as she looked about her in that humble place, although it lacked even the commonest comforts and requisites of such a time.

Christmas is the season of all the year when we should be happy. Are we fretting because we are too poor to give our children the gifts we desire to give? Two thousand years ago another mother had not even a comfortable bed in which to lay her first-born, or one dainty garment in which to clothe his body, and she did not complain. She was content to gather her Son to her heart, though she had no gift but her precious mother-love.

Christmas has come to be regarded almost entirely as a day for feasting and for the exchange of gifts. This is well; gladness and joy should ring a peal in every heart; but that is no reason why he or she that hath should be loaded down and encumbered with useless gifts just because it is a Christmas custom. Exchanges of simple tokens of the love that should be a part of the day, are assuredly appropriate; but while we are spending perhaps more money than we are justified in doing in remembering our loved ones, let us not forget those who are in want of the humblest necessities of life. If we are bemoaning our inability to give as we would wish, let us remember that little family group gathered on that first Christmas in the stable at Bethlehem. Then let our thoughts go out to those to whom the world has not been over kind, and let the generous deed follow the thought. There are none too poor to give a pleasant, loving word, and none so rich as to afford to despise it, or be indifferent to it on this day of days. Let us cherish the true Christmas spirit, and, while giving and receiving all sweet and precious gifts, let us remember with grateful, reverent hearts, that first Christmas gift so freely bestowed, that pearl of great price, whose setting was the bare manger in Bethlehem's stable.

The Workers and the Idlers

IN the beautiful allegory of "The Worker at the Gate," which we publish in another column, there is a truth which may convey a widely different meaning to different people. To the weary and heavy-laden; to those who are bowed down with toil, and who have long since ceased to live for themselves; and especially to those whose lives seem to be spent in the treadmill of laborious daily effort, this allegory brings a measure of sweet consolation and cheer. It tells them that no honest labor is in vain; that the great Father himself is a ceaseless worker, and by His own example, and through the life of His Son on earth, has honored all true work. Christ was a carpenter. On all labor, whether in the field, the workshop, the store, the study, the office, the factory, the mine, or upon the deep sea, the Divine blessing rests, for labor is worship.

To the indolent, the devotee of pleasure, the rich, who plan out for themselves lives of ease and idleness, the allegory cannot have this gracious interpretation.

Its beautiful language must read to them as a rebuke. Aimless and purposeless are such lives, for they contribute nothing to the sum of human knowledge and happiness. It is folly to envy them; they should rather excite pity. If this world is a training school for the next, which is to be one of the highest and noblest activities of which man's spiritual nature is capable, surely he who shirks his task and wastes his time in the pursuit of ephemeral things here, will find occasion for bitter regret. If he has labored neither with hand nor brain; if he has contributed nothing to human knowledge or happiness; if he has had no glimpses of the ideal manhood and of the Divine purpose in our existence here, but has simply lived for pleasure and self-gratification while others were working with all their might for the world's betterment, he has missed the mark irremediably.

An Atheist Temple

FROM an announcement recently made in connection with a public entertainment, we learn that a project is on foot to erect a new temple in New York, to accommodate a class for whom no provision at present exists. The statement occasions some surprise, for it was supposed that every form of belief and many varieties of unbelief were represented among New York's numerous fanes. Like ancient Athens, the city has altars of every kind, and more than one that might appropriately bear the inscription that Paul read on that altar in the old Greek metropolis, "To the Unknown God." Irreligion, however, does not appear to be satisfied with an altar that boasts its ignorance of God, but desires one in which the existence of God is openly denied. No such building, it is said, has yet been opened, and it is this which it is now proposed to erect.

We cannot believe that such a temple is needed. Unhappily there are among the citizens many who live as if there was no God. They ignore him in their lives, they break his commandments, and they are never found among his worshipers, but even they do not go to the extreme of denying his existence. In time of peril, or of sudden calamity they call upon him for help, and in their last moments they appeal to him for mercy. In these days scientists of the most advanced type are acknowledging that their theories do not account for the material world. Others, and these are the great masters, declare that their study of science leads them back to the old faith, and that only the fool, or the man whose studies are shallow and superficial, denies that there is a God. It is not long since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published letters from men of eminence in the Cabinet, the Senate, on the bench, in the army and the navy and in all the professions, men of undoubted ability in every walk of life, avowing themselves believers in the truths of religion. The days of open and avowed infidelity have passed; the theories of Hume and Tom Paine are ridiculed, and the highest intelligence in the world is found now among the ranks of believers. It is a step backward, an admission of ignorance, to call for the erection of a temple devoted to the negation of religion.

Singularly enough, we learn from the man who makes the announcement of the project in the press, and who is an acknowledged leader in the movement, that the demand for the temple originated with the Russian Hebrew refugees who came to this country some years ago, in the beginning of the immigration. He says, "They brought the seed." That fact partly explains the movement. That they have become infidels is possible; they do not know better, and we should pity them, and hope that in a new environment they will learn the folly and wickedness of their attitude. But we cannot believe that American Hebrews have accepted them as leaders. They, of all men, cannot be atheists. Their history is an incontrovertible evidence of God's existence and his faithfulness. That they have, as their leader says, found "their religion an empty shell," we can well believe. But it cannot be filled by a further negation. Its logical tendency is toward the Christ who fulfils the prophecies of their own prophets, and in whom the highest hopes of their race find their fruition.

CHRISTMAS at the Bowery Mission

SINCE Thanksgiving Day, when 1,200 substantial dinners were served to a like number of hungry, homeless, friendless and luckless men and boys, 100 impoverished families were supplied with generous filled baskets, the early morning breakfasts to 1, shivering, unfortunate men, to whom this break of dreary all-night tramp out in the cold and snow and sl is a perfect godsend, have been kept up daily.

The hospitable doors of the Mission are thrown open promptly at one hour after midnight. The lines stretch for over a city block one way, and again as in the other direction, begin to move as soon as the completed hour of the new day is told from the church steeples in the neighborhood, and within a very 1 minutes the hall is filled with men and boys, keenly joying the warmth, light and comfort for a little while as they drink their steaming hot coffee and eat the refreshment from the baker, immediately thereafter resuming their tedious, wearisome tramp for the balance of night, in order to make room for those following behind.

While the breakfasts continue nightly without intermission, great preparations are being made to provide good cheer on Christmas Day for at least 1,500 men and boys, many of whom last year took their Christmas dinner at the old homestead, surrounded by father and mother and friends and kindred dear; for nearly all young men on the Bowery hail from country homes which they but recently left, full of bright hope, to make their fortune in the great metropolis.

But now they are stranded and reduced in means such an extent that even a postage stamp is too great a luxury to be indulged in, and hence the old folks home will receive no tidings from the boy, for whom, all probability, a chair will be placed at the table, hopes that, somehow or other, he will find his way back to the family fireside in time to share the blessing wherewith God has blessed them.*

And while these boys are with us, some, oh so homesick, we must look after them. Christmas must not be passed by them in dreary loneliness, out in the cold, truly in many cases the misfortune that has befallen them is no fault of theirs. They did not know when they started from their homes that there were thousands of workmen in New York. To give them a lift just during the holiday season may prove, and often has proved, a turning-point in many a career. And so we invite them to spend Christmas at the Bowery Mission, where a substantial dinner and a pleasant entertainment will be provided, and where they will hear messages of good cheer and encouragement from the lips of our beloved Superintendent Hallimond, dear Mother Bird and the writer.

If God shall lay it upon the hearts of any of our subscribers, whom He has prospered and blessed, to aid us in this great work, or in providing for Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree for one thousand East Side children of the poor, who, but for this entertainment would go without coats, toys, gloves, warm stockings, or some other useful thing that would contribute to the pleasure and comfort of the little ones, they may send their contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, and in columns they will find early acknowledgment of each and every gift.

Please do your best for the Bowery Mission, the most worthy charity I know of, a haven of rest to many a poor country lad, and a lighthouse to many an unfortunate mariner on the dark and boisterous sea of life.

Louis Klopsch

*Realizing the intense distress which prolonged and unaccountable silence must bring to the hearts of loved ones at home, the Bowery Mission will hereafter provide, free of all facilities for correspondence, and forward, at its own expense, any letters which destitute men and boys may wish to mail to friends at a distance. Any who may desire to return home will be encouraged and assisted, and ambitious ones anxious to stay and win out in the unequal struggle, will be helped, as far as we are able to find suitable employment.

Great Britain in Africa

MORE important and more interesting than was at first supposed, is the territory known as Northern Nigeria, which now is under the British protectorate. It covers an area of 500,000 square miles, and has an estimated population of twenty millions. Sir Frederick Lugard, who has taken prominent part in organizing its government, gives a glowing account of its resources, which appears in the National Geographic Magazine. Cotton has been grown here for many generations. Tanned goat skins have been largely exported, and the country is rich in minerals to an extent undreamed of. Rubber, palm kernels, ivory, gum, and wood oils are already among the exports. A railway through the country would largely increase the value of the products, which are now wasted for lack of facilities of transportation. Hitherto, the chief industry has been slave raiding, from which the chiefs and the king have derived their revenues. No district in Africa," says Sir Frederick Lugard, "has suffered to a similar degree from this odious traffic. Every dry season, regular armies took the field, and large sections of the country were almost entirely depopulated. Ruined towns met the eye in every direction. The currency of the country was almost exclusively slaves. All that is now a thing of the past." Since the British control began, two years ago, the slave raids have entirely ceased. The country has been divided into sixteen provinces, over each of which an agent has been placed, who is held responsible for the oppression of the raids. He is assisted by two political officers, and a police officer, who has under him a force of fifty native constables. They are expected not only to prevent slave-raids, but to see that economic resources and trade are developed. Kano, the capital, is an extensive city, with some pretensions to architecture. The houses are not of the beehive shape common in savage Africa, but have flat roofs, which are made re-proof. A space of thirty-three acres is kept for the king, whose palace is an imposing structure. He ruled with unlimited despotism. One of the pools of the city was a place of execution, and there, at the arbitrary command of the king, men were beheaded. Punishment for minor offences was inflicted at another pool. It consisted in the loss of limbs. The common prison was a horrible place. It was usual to keep two hundred prisoners there, but it is so small that there is not standing room for them. The officer in charge said that many were crushed to death at night, and their dead bodies were hauled away in the morning. There was one decaying, putrid corpse still lying there, when the British Commissioner visited the prison. The British Government are governing through the native king and chiefs. The strange thing is, that now the revenue from the slave trade is cut off, and other arbitrary methods of raising money are stopped, the king has a larger income than before, owing to the better and more orderly administration. The people also are thankful for the change, for now life and property are safe.

When the righteous are in authority the people rejoice; but when the wicked bear rule the people mourn (Prov. 29: 2).

Reform in Russia

The augury of a new era in Russia, which was recognized in the appointment of Prince Sviatopolk-Mirsky as Minister of the Interior, in succession to the hated Plehve, appears to be justified. He has taken a step of a most momentous character. It is to allow the ordinary people of Russia to express their opinions of the need of reform they desire to see in the government of the Empire. To us this seems a very elementary thing, but in Russia it produces astonishment. The people here have hitherto been expected to leave all questions of government to the Czar and the heads of departments, and to suffer in silence. They have had no voice whatever in the government. Now a tentative change has been made. There are throughout the Empire a species of local councils, called Zemstvos, which have control of schools, sanitation, and matters of local concern. Their power is extremely limited, but they are the nearest approach there is to representation of the people. They had no opportunity for united action, and needed to be crowned by a national legislature, which should do for the whole Empire what the Zemstvos did for the provinces and minor districts. Such a step, however, would have been deemed revolutionary, and would have been sternly suppressed as treason. Now, however, about a hundred representatives of the Zemstvos have held a conference in St. Petersburg. It does not appear that the conference had the sanction of the government, but it is very certain that it would not have been held if it had not been assured by the Minister of the Interior that it would not be molested by the police. The conference has been in session for four days, and has framed a memorial to the Czar, urging the necessity for representative institutions. Formerly, such an act would have the deputation from the conference. It is the opinion of men who know Russia thoroughly that it would be a wise thing to make the concession, and that if refused a revolution may break out. The Czar, therefore, is between two fires. On the one hand, if he yields, he incurs the enmity of the aristocrats; and on the other, if he refuses this measure of reform, he faces the danger of revolution. The folly of the aristocrats in resisting the granting of a constitution is like the folly of the princes whom God's ancient prophet reproved:

Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel; remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people (Ezek. 45: 9).

The War

News comes from the Japanese headquarters at Port Arthur that an order has been received by Gen. Nogi from the Emperor, directing that a general attack be made on the fortifications, and that the citadel be captured at any cost. This is probably due to the near approach of the Baltic fleet, which will undoubtedly make a supreme effort to relieve the garrison. Stories come from the besieged fortress indicating that provisions and ammunition are both becoming scarce. It is obvious that it will be Japan's policy to storm the forts before help can come. That the slaughter will be terrific is foreseen. Gen. Stoessel is determined to resist to the last, and will make a desperate defence. His undaunted spirit is shown by the fact that although wounded and confined to his bed in the hospital, he still retained his command, and directed from his bed the movements of the heroic garrison. Whatever the issue may be, his name will live in history as the one great general on the Russian side that the war has produced. While position after position has been abandoned by other generals, he has held fast his post and has stubbornly refused to yield. In the north there was no change in the relative position of the armies. Both are receiving reinforcements and supplies in preparation for a decisive battle. Gen. Kouropatkin is unable to proceed South and Gen. Kuroki has made, up to the close of last week, no further effort to drive him back from Moukden. It is probable, however, that the inaction will end shortly and a decisive battle will take place. Both there and at Port Arthur the conflict will be such as Isaiah graphically described.

The battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood (Isa. 9: 5).

Messages to a Balloon

An attempt was made at the World's Fair, at St. Louis, on Nov. 11, to communicate by wireless telegraphy with a balloon. The balloon used contained 6,000 cubic feet of gas, and had a carrying capacity of 500 pounds. After it had been released it rose rapidly to a height of 1,200 feet, and afterwards to 1,400. When at that height, twenty messages were sent from the station of the wireless system in the Exhibition, and were duly received and recorded. The experiment was considered a success from every standpoint. So satisfactory were the results that it is probable that additional experiments will be made in the near future, when the balloon will be equipped with both receiving and sending instruments. This is said to be the first successful experiment yet made on this side the Atlantic to use the wireless system between the earth and the clouds. If the infidels, who a hundred years ago ridiculed Christians for believing that their prayers were heard in heaven, had been told that, by simple human means, messages would be sent into the clouds in this generation, they would have been as incredulous as they were about prayer.

It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do (Job 11: 8)?

BRIEF NOTES

The Sunday School lesson for December 18 will appear in our issue next week.

A member of the Society of Friends in Philadelphia was offered an order for goods from his factory to be used by the Navy Department. But he declined it, on the ground that it was not consistent with his principles to sell goods to the War or Navy Departments.

VIEW OF THE PALACE OF THE KING AT KANO

KANO, THE CAPITAL OF NORTHERN NIGERIA

brought the signers under the operation of the law which condemns to penal servitude any persons agitating for a change in the form of government. But not only has the memorial been received by Prince Mirsky and presented to the Czar, but that monarch has given audience to a deputation of four members of the conference, in order that they might explain to him more fully the purport of the memorial. It is stated, with some show of authority, that the memorial practically demands in guarded and respectful terms, that a Parliament or Congress elected by the people shall be summoned for legislative purposes. The proposal, it is believed, would be favorably considered by the Czar, but would strike horror into the hearts of the governors and aristocrats who now practically govern the country. So powerful are they, that the Czar may fear to oppose them. It is believed that the known intention of his grandfather, Alexander II, to grant such a concession was the cause of his assassination. It is suspected that it was the aristocrats and not the Nihilists who planned his death. Whether Nicholas II. will have the courage to grant the concession, in the face of their opposition, remains to be seen. It is a good sign that he has consented to listen to

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

"W^HY don't you go on?" he said to Stanton. "The men will listen to you now."

"They don't have to listen to me," Stanton said slowly.

"Fools!" Harvey exploded. Then he got up with a bound, and in one stride was leaning over the footlights. His long arm shot out with rough and vicious gesture, and every man in the hall felt as if something had struck him in the face.

"Hain't you got sense enough yet," he roared, "to know that it's the men that don't believe like we do that can sometimes teach us the most? I don't believe half the stuff Dr. Stanton preaches, but I've got sense enough to keep still while he's talking, and then tell him so when he's got done. And what difference does it make to him anyhow if you don't listen, the man that's got a hearing through the press and the platform a million times bigger'n this; what's the sense of trying to howl him down! Dr. Stanton is my guest. I invited him in here with the consent of the Platform Committee, and by thunder if you don't treat him civilly you can go to kingdom come for a new chairman!"

He stopped suddenly and walked back to his chair. The crowd cheered good-naturedly. Cries of "Stanton!" "Stanton!" went up all over the hall. He nodded in response to Harvey's questioning look and rose and went forward. There was vigorous applause which ceased the minute he began. In that hush Stanton thought he could hear through the open windows an unusually loud roar from the crowd outside. Several faces in the hall turned toward the windows, and at the back of the hall a number of men went out. But it was quiet enough inside, as Stanton said:

"As I was remarking, according to Christ, the most practical remedy for all the troubles of the world is love, and that is the one remedy that you social labor leaders have the least to say about. Take, for example, the programme of the Social Democrats of Berlin, just announced. It is a declaration of remedial measures for the good of the people, and it demands the following:

- "1. One vote for every adult, man and woman; a holiday to be election day; payment of members.
- "2. The government to be responsible to parliament; local self-government; referendum.
- "3. Introduction of the militia system.
- "4. Freedom of speech and freedom of the press.
- "5. Equality of man and woman before the law.
- "6. Disestablishment of the Churches.
- "7. Undenominational schools, with compulsory attendance and gratuitous tuition.
- "8. Gratuitousness of legal proceedings.
- "9. Gratuitous medical attendance and burial.
- "10. Progressive income tax and succession duty."

"This is not the whole platform, but it embraces the main things contended for. Now, of course, I believe in all these things. They seem reasonable to me, and no more than the working men ought to have. But I think that both employer and employed need, more than anything else, to have a mutual brotherly love for each other. 'Man shall not live by bread alone,' is a profound economic statement. If the laboring masses succeed by the ballot or by legislation in getting these things for the physical life, but do not get love to man and love to God, it will profit them nothing. All true progress towards an ideal social condition is based on a deeply religious foundation. That is what all your socialist leaders have left out. They clamor for the bread, but it is bread alone. And when you get it, it will not satisfy you, because a man cannot live by bread alone."

It is doubtful if ten men in the hall understood Stanton. He was conscious of that, but was going on, when a roar of voices outside rose so fierce and sudden that hundreds of men sprung to their feet all over the house.

"Scabs! Down at the mills! Company smuggling 'em in past the guards!"

The cry brought every man to his feet. Harvey flung himself to the front of the platform, and his voice roared over the heads of the men, "No force! No violence! Don't be fools!" He might as well have talked into a cyclone to still it. The mob surged towards the exits of the hall yelling, "Kill the scabs!" "Hang 'em!" "Kill 'em!" Men fought for their lives against the mad rush of those in front to gain the large doors at the rear. Harvey jumped over the footlights, right on the heads of the frenzied, howling mass in front of him, and struck out savagely right and left, as if in swimming, cursing, and threatening, and pleading all in one breath. The men cursed him in return and fought for the exits.

Stanton's next recollection is of a breathless moment, when he found himself face to face with Harvey out doors in front of the hall; the force of the surrounding mob having swept them both out and down the stairs, as if lifted on the torrent of some bursting reservoir. Stanton's immediate thought had been the same as Harvey's. But it is one thing to train men to keep away from a mob; it is another thing to tame a mob after it has once broken loose. It is not impossible to accomplish the first task; it is practically useless to attempt the second.

Stanton looked his interrogation at Harvey. The President of the Union had lost his hat, his collar was missing, and one sleeve of his coat was torn clean off. He was perfectly self-possessed, and answered Stanton's silent query, by saying, "The game's up! They won't listen to reason. Cold lead's the only thing now. And I hope every fool in the Union will catch his dose."

Then a fierce current of different nationalities, composed of half-drunken, howling, swearing, fighting strikers, poured in between Harvey and Stanton, and the next vivid recollection of the events of that night that Stanton had was of seeing a negro surrounded by the mob. This was down by the mills. The negro was tall, burly, and was fighting for his life. His clothes hung about him in rags, blood streamed over his face, ashen-hued and sickly through its black pigment, while the screaming, frenzied mob plucked at him, and struck him with fists and clubs and stones. He was still on his feet when Stanton reached him. He mistook Stanton for an enemy, and struck him a tremendous blow on the face. Stanton reeled, but recovered, flinging his arms about the man, and in doing so received a dozen stunning blows on the head and body. He felt faint and knew that consciousness was going. The next instant he fell, bearing down with him the negro, and as they went down, he was aware of a discharge of guns that roared over and through the mob with grim certainty. Then he felt the trampling rush of many feet striking his prostrate body, and after that he knew nothing more, until he came to himself, to find his wife kneeling over him, wiping the blood from his face, and calling him by name.

"Fredrick! Fredrick! This is terrible! There, dear! Does that feel better?"

He was in great pain, but he smiled at her, and managed to let her know that he was not shot or fatally hurt. Men were still running about, and several dark forms were on the ground. The negro lay partly under Stanton. Some one came running up hastily and got down by Stanton. It was Harvey, stained with blood and breathless, but raging over the fool mob.

"Oh Mrs. Stanton! I'm Harvey, I'll get Dr. Stanton home. You're not shot? You went down just in time. That was a brave deed, and I'll never forget it. I saw the whole thing."

He called for help. The soldiers carried Stanton and the negro over to the office of the mill company. After some delay the doctors succeeded in getting an ambulance.

"What'll we do with him?" asked Harvey of the doctor, pointing to the negro, who was still unconscious.

Stanton heard him.

"Bring him up to the house with me," Stanton whispered.

So the man was sent along in the ambulance with him, and Mrs. Stanton, with the help of a neighbor's wife, nursed and tended both patients until morning, which brought with it the relief of the doctor's assurance that neither Stanton nor his unexpected guest were in any danger.

The Lenox Times summed up the whole affair next morning. "Six killed, twenty-four seriously wounded. The soldiers fired only after everything else had been done to disperse the mob. Bruce Harvey is emphatic in his denunciation of the men who led off in the attack on the scab workmen. Most of them were negroes, brought up here last night by the company, who hoped to get them inside while the strikers were holding the meeting uptown. The guards had grown careless, and it was all through an accident that the design of the company was discovered. As usual, whiskey figured in the affair to a large extent. The first trouble started from the saloon on B street. One of the negroes, who was badly beaten, was rescued by Dr. Stanton, and is now at his house. Mrs. Stanton was uneasy over her husband, and hearing the noise of the mob, ventured down near the mill, and was one of the first to be present just after the fatal volley was fired. We are happy to state that Dr. Stanton is not dangerously hurt. The whole awful affair is a logical outcome of the strike, which is to be deplored from every point of view. It is useless to argue with the mob, but the responsibility for this loss of life rests with the Union. Public sentiment which has partly at least, been with them, is now wholly with the mill company. Let the law deal quickly and severely with the guilty."

Within a week Stanton had recovered from the injuries sufficient to sit up. The negro was in the new room, and still in bed, unable to move except with great difficulty. He had suffered from a blow which had crippled his back.

Stanton hobbled into the room one evening, and said down by the man.

"Well, brother, how are you getting on now?" he said, cheerily.

The man looked at Stanton somewhat vacantly at first, and then his face cleared up as he said, painfully.

"I'm feeling pretty bad, Dr. Stanton. But I don't know what would have become of me if you hadn't brought me here. I'm awfully sorry I struck you the night. I didn't know."

Stanton put his hand up to his own face and felt of the scar on his cheek.

"You hit hard. But I threw you all right."

"Mrs. Stanton tells me you saved my life. I won't forget it."

The man raised a grateful face towards Stanton, and big tears rolled down his cheeks.

After a while Stanton said simply:

"Tell me your story. Mrs. Stanton has given me a little of it."

"Not much to tell, Dr. Stanton. I was working in the stamp mill at Harlan. When the strike began there, I was thrown out. My brother was killed during the trouble at Ball's mill. He was a scab, too. Then I came up here with the crowd. The Lenox mill agent got me to come on promise of big pay and protection. I need the work. My wife and three children are at Harlan now."

"Why didn't you join the Union?"

"Would you join an organization that killed your own brother, and then threatened to kill you because you wanted work?"

Stanton looked at the man and was silent. His mind was going over the field of action covered by the history of trades-unions, and all the good and bad commingled that the organizations had been so far productive of.

"Besides that, Dr. Stanton, in one of the shops at Harlan where I worked for six months as a helper the Union would not admit a black man. Am I to blame for being black? All I ask is a fair chance to work for my family. Then I am called a scab and they try to kill me. Is that right?"

Stanton did not reply. What answer was there to a cry like that? After a little more talk with the man he went back to his room. In three weeks the negro was well enough to get up and leave the house. He was simply one human life that drifted into the current of the lives of Fredrick Stanton and his wife Mildred, one out of hundreds that rapidly became a strange and vivid part of their history, now that the world had become their parish instead of Saint Cecilia. How diminutive and contracted that little parish of the Metropolitan Church seemed to both of them now. And yet Fredrick Stanton still loved the Church, and it was within range of possibility for him to go back into the ministry.

He was beginning to feel perfectly strong again, and was looking over a large mail, which contained many invitations to lecture, and talking over the matter with his wife, when Bruce Harvey called.

After inquiries as to his recovery, and the whereabouts of the negro scab, Harvey said gloomily, "Matters look bad for us, Mr. Stanton. Since that night we've steadily lost ground. To-day the company started up the lower mill with two hundred non-union men, and there was no resistance. It looks as if we were going to lose everything, after all."

"You have lost public sympathy. Violence is expensive. Besides, your cause was not just, to begin with. The public will never really endorse a strike that began like this one. Of course, you have a perfect right to strike. But you have no right to force all men into your Union, or dictate to them."

"Why don't they join the Union then?" burst out Harvey, with one of his fits of sudden rage. "Why don't they see what is good for them and help organize one solid compact of labor! The scab is an enemy of the workingman's best interests. He is like a traitor in the republic. And while I did my best, as you know, to prevent violence or force, I cannot help feeling bitter toward the men who refuse to join with us in a common fight against the unjust exactions of Capital!"

"Of course I don't agree with your point of view of the whole question, Mr. Harvey. I think the Labor Unions and the Socialistic Parties, and the other organizations that are antagonistic to Capital, are ignoring the one greatest thing in the world that can bring any real remedy to bear. You heard me state it the other night. I don't need to repeat it."

Harvey was silent, his large, heavy face showed gloomy and doubtful.

"Mr. Stanton, I've read your book several times, and I've admired it. There's a good deal in it to admire. And I'm frank to say I admire you and the course you have taken. But there are some things you don't know. Pardon me for saying it. You have never been through the mill yourself. You have studied these questions and mastered them in one way. But the real reason for the struggle between Capital and Labor; the real reason why the world, right now, is moving rapidly toward Socialistic ideas, has not been really grasped by you. If you will come with me to-night, and spend three or four hours with me right here in Lenox, I think I can show you why it is that the struggle of Labor is so bitter; why it is that we have made blunders and mistakes like the one the other night; why it is that your doctrine of Love, as you call it, won't work."

"I'm ready to go," said Stanton, eagerly. One of his best traits was an unaffected willingness to be taught any truth. It was with a certain eager anticipation of something worth while, that he accepted Harvey's challenge. For it seemed to him almost like that.

"You will not get my husband into any more mobs, will you, Mr. Harvey?" asked Mildred, as the two men went out.

"I'll promise that, Mrs. Stanton," Harvey answered with a grave smile. "We are going down by the mill first, but there is no danger now."

Stanton kissed his wife good-bye, and went out with Harvey, anticipating curiously the man's purpose. But neither of them will ever know how much that night's experience had to do with the shaping of many important events in the life of each one of them.

CHAPTER III

ON the way down to the mills, Harvey was silent. When they reached the long row of tenements where the mill operatives lived, he hesitated a moment, then went on past them to the first mill, where the work was being resumed by the non-union men.

The foreman, who knew Harvey, at first bluntly told him he could not enter. But after a few words he stepped aside and let Harvey and Stanton in, following them in the round they slowly made through the casting-room, where the men were at work.

The night shift was being initiated into its duties by small gangs of men familiar with the details. Stanton had been through the Lenox mills several times, and knew quite thoroughly the different processes, but the sight of them always fascinated him, and he never lost his wonder over the human ingenuity which fashioned the machinery and controlled its movements.

There was one huge contrivance in particular, which always seemed like a monster possessing actual intelligence. It moved on a steel track high over the billows of gas and smoke that filled the building, and it had a number of steel arms that rose and fell, that elongated and shot out, grasping immense pieces of white, hot metal, and dropping them wherever the god of the machine directed. The men called it the "Octopus," and it had more than a score of human victims to its grim credit, who had carelessly or incautiously disobeyed the mechanical clock-like exactness of its reach. The man who sat up in its centre, directing its tentacles, was like a human spider. He worked his levers and shouted his replies to orders from beneath in an uncanny bellow, that always seemed to Stanton like the voice of the machine itself.

As they went the round, dodging the glowing sparks, stepping out of the way of bars of white steel, that swept over mysterious tracks on cars that vanished with their loads into furnaces that shot from their incandescent openings, dazzling, great spears of light, that stabbed the toilers with unearthly heat, and made their grimy figures take on for the while the appearance of demons in some underground smithy of Vulcan. Stanton wondered, as he had wondered before, if it all paid, really paid, this pain that civilization exacted as the penalty for being civilized, and having railroads, and steel bridges, and things. And these were his brothers, at least his Christian faith taught him that; but looking at them there swarming under the tentacles of the "Octopus," it was not easy to believe that they were any more than parts of the forge, which could easily be replaced at so much a day when burned out, as they were, on the average, every twelve years. "Let us be civilized or die," he had heard Harvey say once. And he added, immediately, "and die—same thing."

Coming out into the night air was like stepping into a cold-storage room, yet it was a warm summer

"Wherever you say. I'm learning of you to-night," said Stanton briefly.

Fifteen minutes' walk brought the two into the better residence portion of Lenox. Ten minutes more and they were in the fashionable district where the churches were congregated.

"All the churches at one end of the town and the saloons at the other," said Harvey with a sneer. They were going by the front of Saint Cecilia, and Stanton was thinking of the same fact. He looked down the beautiful elm-shaded street, and counted six church towers of as many different denominations. The massive, expensive church buildings were all closed and dark. The saloons down by the "Row" had all been wide open and brilliantly lighted. It was only a little after ten o'clock, and the saloons would be open until one or two, and some of them all night. There was a Lenox saloon ordinance compelling them to close at midnight, but it had never been enforced. The attempt to enforce it had never been made, but the brewers of Lenox would have considered it a blow at their "personal liberty" if the authorities had moved against them. The liquor business is so constitutionally and habitually and persistently lawless that it has come to regard its own habits as the only lawful ones, and is naturally pained and indignant to have an officious mayor or policeman do his sworn duty. Meanwhile, it coins money day and night, and Sundays, while the big stone churches in the big cities, as a rule, do as Lenox does, open up twice a week for well-dressed people, who are, for the most part self-satisfied, and pass by on the other side. Were these dirty common mill men, these strikers, these rioting, drunken mobs, any relation to Saint Cecilia's elegantly refined and perfumed congregation? Only a part of the Brotherhood, Saint Cecilia. But your Christianity has not meant that to you, in spite of your distinguished wealth and culture. When you have come to the place of this fallen neighbor, you have promptly and religiously passed by on the other side. Will it be any more than your just deserts, if, in the making up of the rewards in the last Great Day, the Judge of all the earth shall say to you, oh, beautifully dressed Saint Cecilia, 'Depart from me! I never knew you'?"

In between the churches, handsome residences with wide lawns and lovely foliage. In front of one of the largest of these houses, Harvey stopped and said, "Wait here a minute!"

The house was whitely dazzling, with lights at every window. Elegantly dressed people were going and coming. Carriages and automobiles were crowding up to the curb in numbers, to receive or discharge their owners. Strains of music came from the open windows of the ball-room. The vision gained from the street of the whole affair, was that of lavish and indifferent display of excessive wealth, which did not know what to do with itself, except eat, drink, dress, gamble, and amuse itself generally.

Harvey touched Stanton's arm, and the two walked along slowly.

He then began to talk in a low tone, quite dispassionately. There was not a trace of bitterness or even anger, that Stanton could detect in him. It revealed a new and unexpected characteristic of the man, and gave Stanton one more reason for Harvey's popularity with the Union.

"You know, I suppose, that was Harwood's house. He is one of the largest owners of the upper mill. The earning capacity of that mill, according to the company's own statement, two years ago, was seven million. The net earnings, you understand, for dividends. Harwood is one out of twenty other men in Lenox who control the upper mill. It is strictly a trust, a monopoly of the most absolute character. You see how Harwood lives. The house is a palace. You see how his friends live. There's one of their houses."

They were then passing a magnificent residence, in front of which was a splendidly wrought iron gate and fence bounding a beautiful lawn. "Wrightam lives there—he's another millionaire, whose money comes out of the labor of Lenox lower mill. His family all go to Newport in the summer. His boys drink and gamble and his girls smoke cigarettes, and from what everybody says the old man and his wife are not on speaking terms half of the time; but the main thing is money with him and her. Now Mr. Stanton—" Harvey turned his head a little more towards Stanton—"I said you did not understand the real reason for the socialistic movement, or the trade-unions movement. Your book is clever. I don't deny that, and you have shrewdly and truly hit on some real causes of popular social discontent."

"THE MAN WHO SAT IN ITS CENTRE, DIRECTING ITS TENTACLES, WAS LIKE A HUMAN SPIDER"

evening. Harvey looked at his watch, thoughtfully.

"Let's walk down past the 'Row,'" he said briefly.

The "Row" was the mill tenement district. It was over four blocks long, and as ugly and uninviting as red brick and uniform dimensions could make it. Stanton had also seen this numbers of times. It was no better, no worse, than hundreds or thousands of such rows of houses all over the world, where Labor eats and sleeps and calls it home. There were the same unending number of steps bordered by squares of trampled sod or bare dirt; the same dreary displays of litter on sidewalk or in gutter; the same corresponding rows of saloons on the opposite side of the street, where Labor drowned its cares and spent its last cent; in the daytime, the same squalid, dirty groups of children and pathetic and apathetic women, foreground and background for the "Row." The higher-priced laborers lived in better houses and their wives and daughters were smartly dressed, and there was a "grading up" that argued well or ill for the future as it meant more civilization or more caste spirit; but the Lenox mill "Row" that Harvey and Stanton walked slowly past, was typical of the rank and file of average labor in Lenox, and could be duplicated over and over again in any large factory or mill centre in the world.

All this time Harvey had not said anything, and Stanton had not asked any questions. Coming to the end of the tenements, the President of the Union said, "It's ten o'clock. Shall we go up on the avenue?"

Why Jesus Came as a Child

INTERNATIONAL CHRISTMAS LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE life of Jesus did not really begin on that first Christmas day in Bethlehem. His cousin, John the Baptist, who was six months older, once said of Jesus: "He was before me." Jesus said of himself: "Before Abraham was, I am." At another time, looking up to heaven, Jesus prayed: "Father, glorify me with the glory that I had with Thee before the world was." That is the first volume in the life of Jesus, his life with God "before the world was." Let us make or think of a frame for a picture of the life of Christ, and put yellow rays of glory in the upper left hand corner to picture that first volume of Christ's life. The second volume is about Jesus as the world's Creator. In the first chapter of John we are told of him who was afterward "made flesh and dwelt among us." "All things were made by him." The same thing is said in Colossians and Hebrews. The "Apostle's Creed," to be should be changed "I believe in God, er of heaven and Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord." It was by him God made the worlds. No wonder Jesus loved the flowers, and stilled the stormy sea and the demoni- ac soul, for he made them all. We will put into the lower part of our picture a green hill to represent the world, mineral and vegetable creations, and on it white sheep, to represent animal life, and brown shepherds, to represent God's highest creation of men. We will put a star into the picture to remind us he made other worlds besides ours. The third volume in the life of Jesus is made up of the thirty-three visits he made to the world in the Old Testament times, his appearances to Abraham, Moses, and others, that are called "theophanies," that is, visible manifestations of God. "No man hath seen God [the Father] at any time; the only begotten son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath revealed him." That verse proves that when God is spoken of as seen, it must be the Son. Those short visits of the Jehovah-Jesus, the Lord of angels, who is often called "the angel of Jehovah," were revelations of God's love and justice. We will here put into our picture a white-robed manly figure on the hill-top, with angels all about him as his army in the air.

See! We have already pictured the beginning of the fourth and greatest volume of the life of Jesus, his human life on earth, for here are the shepherds and the angels proclaiming the Christ-child.

Let us pause for a little to recall that the prophets—Isaiah most of all—foretold all the life of Christ on earth hundreds of years before he came. We might make quite a complete life of Jesus from the words of Isaiah, written seven hundred years before the first Christmas. Let us turn to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Red Letter Bible, and from the red and starred verses arrange

THE LIFE OF JESUS IN ISAIAH

Isaiah proclaims Jesus as one descended from Jacob, from Jesse, from David (2: 3; 11: 1; 22: 22). Thus he pictures his birth: "A virgin shall conceive, and shall bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (7: 14). "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called Wonderful" (9: 6). And thus Isaiah pictures Christ's spiritual baptism: "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek" (11: 2; 61: 1, 2). And here is Isaiah's beautiful picture of Christ's miracles: "The eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing" (35: 5, 6; 42: 7). We can almost see Jesus blessing little children as we read Isaiah's words: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom." His wisdom and gentleness as a teacher and a friend of sinners is pictured in the words: "The bruised reed he will not break, and the smoking flax he will not quench" (42: 3; 61: 2; 11: 3-5; 52: 13; 55: 5, 6; 49: 8-10). His words of severe but loving warning Isaiah thus describes: "Thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff" (41: 15, 16; 40: 10). Here is Isaiah's Gethsemane: "I have trodden the wine press alone" (Isa. 63: 1, 3, 8, 9). Isaiah's crucifixion is greatest of all his pictures: "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities" (8: 14; 52: 14; 53: 5). Isaiah also pictures the final world-wide triumph of the Crucified: "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end" (9: 7; 2: 2-14; 11: 10).

Isaiah told the Jews that Jesus would come to be both a sovereign and a sufferer. They thought he must mean that there would be two Messiahs, for they could not understand how a king could die for his people. Messiah in Hebrew, and the equivalent word in Greek, Christ, both mean anointed, that is, one anointed with oil to be a king. Christ's kingly coming was to bring "light" to those in the "darkness" of oppression.

At last, to the shepherds of Bethlehem, watching their flocks by night—a company of the lowliest people—came the "glad tidings," brought by angels, that the long-expected visit of God to man, in human form, was about to begin (Luke 2: 8-20). Among the angels was One who said to the trembling shepherds: "Fear not, for there is born unto you this day in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. Ye shall find him swaddled like any other child, but in a cradle lowlier than the lowest, a cattle trough in yonder stable."

The next event in the life of Jesus, after the adoration of the Shepherds, occurred eight days after his birth, when he was called Jesus, meaning Saviour (Luke 2: 21). Because New Year's is eight days after Christmas, it is sometimes called "The Lord's Name Day." It ought to be a saving day to many every year. Next in order was the presentation in the temple, when Simeon and Anna recognized Jesus as the promised One, perhaps through seeing the angel light in his face (Luke 2: 22-39). Not until after all these events did the wise men arrive from far-off Persia. Jesus was no longer cradled in the manger, but they found him in a "house" where Joseph and Mary were living. These magi, bending from their dusty camels as they entered Jerusalem, had asked the traders and politicians went to gather there the startling question, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" No wonder wicked King Herod was troubled when he heard of their question. His order to kill all the children of Bethlehem of two years and under, shows that the magi must have seen the star that proclaimed his birth at least a year before. Because of Herod's hate, hardly had the magi's adoration ceased before the infant Jesus was hurried away to Egypt to save his life, whence he came back in early childhood to grow up as a Nazarene, a carpenter boy, passing from childhood's play into boyhood's study and toil. Such is the story of the child life of Jesus, all of which may fitly be recalled on Christmas Day.

ILLUSTRATION AND APPLICATION

How should Christmas be observed? Should it be as the devil would wish us to spend it, or as Jesus would have us spend it? To be wicked on Christmas day is the very worst profanity. To take God's name in vain is bad enough. To profane God's Sabbath is worse. But to make Christmas the time for wicked dissipation is as great a sacrilege as when the young king Belshazzar took God's sacramental cups to pass wine to the drunken men and women at his table that night when God wrote his sentence of death in fire on the palace wall. It is sinful also to fill the Christmas season with selfishness, thinking more of what we shall receive than of what we shall give, more of eating than of praising God.

How would Jesus have us spend Christmas? Of course he would have us in spirit spend it as nearly like the way he spent that first Christmas as is possible. He who was rich, the millionaire of stars, "for our sakes became poor." He came down from his home in glory to lift up the lowly. We, too, in some lesser ways, can illustrate noblesse oblige. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." The best way to thank him is to pass on his gifts.

When Mark Guy Pearse was a boy, he was at school in Germany, though his home was in Cornwall. In those days it was necessary to take train to Bristol, and to travel thence by boat. When he had paid his passage money on the boat, all his money was gone. However he thought he needed no more, and ate his meals and enjoyed the breezes with a light heart. But when the voyage was nearly ended, the steward presented a bill for some extra food. "I haven't any money," replied the boy. "You should not have ordered the things," answered the steward. "What is your name?" "Mark Guy Pearse."

The steward shut his pocket-book with a snap. "Why, I know your father. When I was a boy and my mother a widow, your father gave me five shillings. All he made me promise was that if I found someone else in distress, I would pass it on." The steward put Mark into a boat paid the bill, and gave the boy five shillings for himself. When Mark Guy Pearse grew up, he stood one day by a ticket-office, and saw a boy crying. "What's the matter, my lad?" said he kindly. "I've not enough money for my fare, and my friends are expecting me," sobbed the boy. "Here's the money," said the minister. "Now, come in with me, and I will tell you a story." He told the boy of what has just been told. "I'm passing on what was given to me; what will you do?" "I'll pass it on," said the boy. Let this motto mean more than passing on material gifts. If you have received God's "unspeakable gift," "pass it on," the blessing of pardon and peace that Jesus brings to every heart he enters.

Let us make this Christmas lesson the inauguration of a revival among the children. The angel did not say, as the old version of the Bible mistranslated it: "Good-will to men," as if all men, bad and good, were pleasing to God, and entitled to the Christmas "peace." What the angel said was: "On earth peace among men, in whom he is well pleased." "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

[The lesson for December 18, "Review of the Quarter," will appear next week.]

When the Ship Comes In

By Margaret E. Sangster

BLOWN hither by favoring winds, or battered by adverse gales, it makes little difference, if only the ship comes safe to land, bringing her passengers home, and depositing her cargo with its consignees. The important thing is not so much that the ship has had either rough weather or a smooth voyage, but that she has reached her destination. Always there are light hearts and glad voices when the ship returns. Often there are tears when she sails away, for partings are hard, and meetings are joyful. Long and dreary may be the nights of watching, but they are soon forgotten in the rosy dawn, when up the harbor her sails are spread, her flag is flying, and the ship comes gallantly home.

Some of us have had ships at sea for a great while.

They have tarried many days, many weeks, perhaps many years, and we've almost lost heart, thinking we shall never see them more. In the meantime, if discreet and thrifty, we have worked steadily on just as if we owned nothing in ships that were out of sight. The little craft that we manage close in shore must always be our main dependence. There is a good deal of peril, and waste, and the pain of hope deferred, in counting too much on our faraway ships. People of sanguine temperament are given to mortgaging the future, drawing recklessly on investments that are vanishing quantities, and spending with a lavish hand gold, that for all they know, may be lying at the bottom of the ocean. Until the ship has actually made its wharf, don't publish your balance sheet.

Some of the ships that start forth with fairest hopes are never seen again. Some drift into wrong courses, and some are wrecked on stormy coasts. We cannot reckon very much on the ships that delay beyond their appointed time. To drop metaphor, it is the part of prudence to let each day tell for the best that it can, in work, in study, in aspiration, not sitting down and supinely waiting for some good fortune that is expected, but which may never be ours. For example, the man who takes a house bigger and more costly than he can afford, because he has the prospect of a large legacy from the estate of a kinsman, who may change his will a dozen times before he dies, is foolishly investing in a ship that may never come in. All sorts of complications and mortifications will be his portion while he is waiting for the good luck that may be, after all, a broken reed. A woman one day appeared at the house of a friend, arrayed in velvet and costly furs. The friend controlled her surprise at the magnificent raiment conspicuously out of character with the position of the wearer, but the latter airily explained: "We haven't very much ready money, but I have an account at several shops, and these things won't have to be paid for till the season is nearly over. By that time, John's ship will have come in. You know he is going to make a pile of money on that Western land of his."

The pile of money was not made. The ship did not come in, and a good deal of suffering was undergone by the couple who had so unwisely allowed themselves to become embarrassed, by buying what they could not afford.

A husband, proud of his wife's beauty, and hating to deny her any request, sometimes breaks down, and dies in the middle of his days, through carrying too much weight; the man is bowed under burdens he should never have borne, and worn out with the strain of corroding anxiety.

Other days there are when the ship comes in, days which have no such shadow of gloom. Deep is the gloom when the ship arrives too late, and everything is spent before it comes. It does not then bring very much satisfaction.

There are little ships that come to harbor bringing nothing but radiant gladness. The day when the baby is born is one such day of joy.

Some of the sweetest love poems that have been written when the baby's ship has come safe in, have sprung from the thankful hearts of fathers. Mothers have no monopoly of tenderness when babies are concerned. And men write as fondly as women of home and childhood and love.

Mr. George W. Cable wrote a lovely little verse called "The Last Arrival." If it happens that you Where did you get that little tear?

I found it waiting when I got here.
What makes your cheek like a warm white rose?
I saw something better than any one knows.
Where did you get those arms and hands?
Love made itself into bonds and hands.
Feet, whence did you come, you darling things?
From the same box as the cherub's wings.
How did they all just come to be you?
God thought about me, and so I grew.
But how did you come to us, you dear?
God thought about you, and so I am here.

Whenever a deserved recognition comes to a man or woman, in any sphere of service, it is in effect the coming in of a ship that has been waited for. The prizes of life earned by brave endeavor are white-winged ships that bring delight.

We are, by the way, of being much too serious and grave, in the conduct of our days, and we do not allow ourselves to be as merry as we ought. After childhood, very few of us in this strenuous time of ours, know how to play. We feel that we must always be tense, keyed up and ready for action. When our ships come in, do not let us be so sober that we cannot enjoy them. Every such arrival should give us a chance to have a household reunion, or a festival, or wholesome gayety and mirth.

As we grow older, we especially need to remember that this is a good world to live in, full of good people who love us, and that our business here is to be happy ourselves, and make others happy. Away with the spirit of the pessimist, who sees no blue in the sky, because a shower is passing, who hears the sobbing of the wind, but not the joyous symphony of the breezes that float from shores of balm. Though there are losses, there are gains; though sorrow enters, joy stays longest, and it's a good world, whether our ships come in or not.

A Humble Life

Not long ago an old man died in New Jersey. He had lived three years longer than the century, and until he was ninety-seven, when he was retired on a pension, he had been a switchman on the Erie Railroad. He was said to be the best switchman in the employ of the company. His habit of total abstinence had been formed in youth, and he proudly showed the pledge he had signed when Father Matthew preached temperance in Ireland. The good man had no disease. He died as a tree might die—of old age. One word that he said to his friends is worth repeating: "I never tried to climb. I tried to do my whole duty in the humble station to which God was pleased to call me." All honor to his memory!

MARY. I have never believed very much in judging character by handwriting. To some extent our teachers and the system we learn affect our writing. Penmanship should be legible and neat.

—SARA L. The home of F. Marion Crawford is in Italy, and most of his books have an Italian background and Italian characters. They throw a sidelight on modern Italy.

—MRS. R. S. You can probably find out what you wish to know about your patriotic ancestry by an examination of the historical records of your own State, or of the State from which they came. If not convenient to do this in person, get some friend to do it for you.

—ISABELLE. Girls of fourteen who wish to give an evening party, and to have it pleasant, should invite the girls they know and a few of the girls' brothers. Have an even number of boys and girls. If you want a good deal of fun, I advise having a candy-pull, or else an advertisement party, with simple refreshments afterward. You pin pictures from familiar advertisements on a sheet without any text to tell what they are. Then have prizes for those who make the best guesses and for those who make the worst.

SANTA CLAUS MAKING UP HIS LISTS

The good old Santa of legend and song, who comes down the chimney at Christmastide, is making his lists many pages long, in the heavy book, so thick and wide. He looks at the record the children have made, and picks out the best—so the story goes, Then sorts out the gifts of every grade; who'll get the finest? Only Santa knows.

have not read it, you will be sure to like it, as it is quoted for you here:

There came to port last Sunday night,
The queerest little craft:
Without an inch of rigging on,
I looked, and looked, and laughed!
It seemed so curious that she Should cross the unknown water,
And moor herself within my room,
My daughter, oh, my daughter.

And George MacDonald, writing when the same sort of ship came in, said:

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into the here.
Where did you get those eyes of blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.

"Uncle Sam's Santa Claus"

THERE is a woman who, for upward of a quarter of a century, has held one of the most responsible positions in the government service at Washington, and who enjoys perhaps the oddest nickname ever applied to an American citizen. Her real name is Mrs. Patti Lyle Collins, but to most of her friends, and to thousands of people who never saw her, she is known as "Uncle Sam's Santa Claus," or "Mrs. Santa Claus." Mrs. Collins, who is one of the experts in the Dead Letter Office, has acquired her unique title by reason of the fact that she is in charge of the division of the office to which come all the letters sent through the mails, which cannot be delivered because of unintelligible addresses. Thousands of "Santa Claus letters," written and mailed each year by children in all parts of the country, are sent to Mrs. Collins.

MRS. COLLINS, THE DEAD-LETTER EXPERT to learn that at each holiday season more than 20,000 letters, in childish handwriting, are dropped into the letter-boxes and post-offices of the United States, addressed to Santa Claus, "North Pole," "Iceland,"

"Snow-land," or "In Heaven." These letters, one and all, tell what the juvenile correspondents would like to receive for Christmas, and sometimes Santa Claus is thanked for past favors. This avalanche of missives comes to Mrs. Collins, and usually she finds it necessary to greatly increase her force of assistants in order to handle the accumulation. There are often very pathetic appeals in the letters, and occasionally Mrs. Collins is enabled to bring great happiness to desolate homes, by bringing such worthy cases to the attention of persons of means, who are glad of the opportunity to do good at the joyous Christmas season.

The President on "The Simple Life"

INTRODUCING Pastor Charles Wagner of Paris, the author of The Simple Life, to a Washington audience a few days ago, President Roosevelt, speaking of the possibilities of doing good that lay within our reach, told the following remarkable incident:

"A few weeks ago, when I was walking back from church one Sunday, I noticed a great fire, and found that it was Downey's livery stable—you recollect it, three or four weeks ago, when the livery stable burned. Through a train of circumstances that I need not mention, my attention was particularly called to the case, and I looked into it. I had long known of the very admirable work done with singular modesty and self-effacement by Mr. Downey in trying to give homes to the homeless and to be himself a friend of those in peculiar sense friendless in this community, and I now by accident found out what had happened in connection with this particular incident.

"It appears that last spring Mr. Downey started to build a new livery stable. His stable is next door to a colored Baptist Church. Mr. Downey is a white man and a Catholic, and these neighbors of his are colored men and Baptists, and their kinship was simply the kinship of that broad humanity that should underlie all our feelings toward one another. Mr. Downey started to build his stable, and naturally wanted to have it as big a stable as possible, and to build it right up to the limits of his land. That would bring the wall close up against the back of the colored Baptist church, cutting out the light and air.

"The preacher called upon him and told him that they would like to purchase a strip six feet broad of the ground of Mr. Downey, upon which he was intending to build, as it would be a great inconvenience to them to lose the light and air; that they were aware that it was asking a good deal of him to cramp the building out of which he intended to make his livelihood, but that they hoped he would do it because of their need.

"After a good deal of thought Mr. Downey came to the conclusion that he ought to grant the request, and so he notified them that he would change his plans, make a somewhat smaller building and sell them the six feet of land in the strip adjoining their church. After a little while the preacher came around with the trustees of his church, and said that they very much appreciated Mr. Downey's courtesy and were sorry they had bothered him as they had, because, on looking into the affairs of the church, they found that as they were already in debt they did not feel warranted in incurring any further financial obligations, and so they had to withdraw their request. They thanked him for his kindly purpose and said goodby.

"But Mr. Downey found he could not get to sleep that night until finally he made up his mind that as they could not buy it, he would give it to them anyway, which he did. But, unfortunately, we know that the tower of Siloam often falls upon the just and the unjust alike, and Mr. Downey's livery stable caught fire and burned down. It was Sunday morning, and the Baptist Church was in session next door to him; and the clergyman stopped and said: 'Now, you women, stay here and pray, and, you men, go straight out and help our benefactor, Mr. Downey.' And go out they did, and got his horses all out, so that none of them were burned, although he suffered otherwise a total loss.

"Now I call that a practical application of Mr. Wagner's teachings. Here in Washington we have a right to be proud of a citizen like Mr. Downey; and if only we can develop enough such citizens, we shall turn out just the kind of community that does not need to, but will always be glad to study the Simple Life."

An Old Brooklyn Church

Saint Mary's Protestant Episcopal Church of Brooklyn, is planning a distinctly novel celebration for the Sunday before Christmas. The Old Home Week idea, so popular in New England, is to be utilized, and all former parishioners of this famous old church—of whom there are many thousands scattered over the whole United States—are to be especially invited to return and worship together to commemorate the seventieth birthday of their first church home. This parish was established seventy years ago. After outgrowing three buildings, the church in 1863 erected its present large and handsome structure at Clason and Willoughby Avenues. Since 1835 eight rectors have served the parish, they being successively the Reverends Joseph Hunter, John F. Messenger, and John Alden Spooner; the Reverend Doctors Thomas F. Guion, John W. Shackelford, Daniel V. M. Johnson, W. W. Bellinger, and the present rector, the Rev. Dr. James Clarence Jones.

Exercise great care in the selection of the soap you use for a shampoo. The Ivory Soap is made of vegetable oil, contains no alkali and is soothing and healing to the scalp.

German Missionary Martyrs

ON August 13th, in the Catholic Mission station of St. Paul in the Baining Mountains, on the Island of Neupommern (one of the Bismarck Archipelago group, in the Pacific Ocean, off the east of New Guinea), Fathers Matthaus Rascher, of Sambach, Bavaria, and Heinrich Rutten, of Tilburg, Holland; laybrothers, Kornelius Schellekens, Eduard Plasschaert and Alois Bley; and Sisters Katharina Atsch, Katharina Holler, Anna Schmidt, Elizabeth Rasch and Wilhelmina Balka, were murdered by natives. At eight o'clock in the morning, Pastor Rascher and Sister Anna were shot, and shortly after the remaining brothers and sisters were killed with hatchets and knives.

privation, carried on the work of training their scholars and orphans. What caused the Bainingers to kill the missionaries is not clear. Perhaps a wrong interpretation of their customs had a great deal to do with it. The murder was committed by three slaves and the natives of the neighboring mission station to St. Paul. The three murderers had had mission training, had been baptized, and had lived for seven years with Pastor Rascher. After the crime, the murderers and their accomplices went to Nacharunep, a station 200 metres higher up, several hours distant, and murdered Pastor Rutten. They also robbed the mission station of Brother Matthias Folger at Marienhohe. Three at

THE MISSION STATION OF ST. PAUL, WHERE THE MASSACRE OCCURRED

In 1897, the Mission had the stations Unamarita and Ramandu, on the northern coast of the Gazelle Peninsula; two years later, Pastor Rascher established the station St. Paul, two hours inland from Unamarita, in the midst of a tropical woods. St. Paul had two schools and two orphanages for the native children. One of the missionaries started a saw-mill, and they cultivated the land in this magnificent tropical region. On the 26th of August, the consecration of the newly-built church was to take place. Pastor Rascher eagerly interested himself in the station, which certainly prospered under his direction. He was the first who got out a grammar of the Baining language, which till then was practically unknown to foreigners. His sudden death cut short his labors on dictionary and on his writings about the customs of the people. Pastor Rutten had only worked at St. Paul's for a short time. The five women had implicitly trusted the inhabitants, and, with great tacks were made at the station Unamarita, but they were repulsed by the missionaries with the assistance of the colonists. It was difficult to capture and punish the murderers, because the country has so many high mountains and canons. Through the thick native woods, there is no path or road which leads to the native dwellings. Their miserable huts are mostly on the tops of high mountain peaks, or in the thick forests.

On August 14th, news of the murder was brought to Herbertshohe, and the police of that place immediately went to the scene of the murder, and coming in contact with the natives, fifteen of the latter were killed. Berlin received official news of this from the German Governor of New Guinea by way of Sydney, on October 22. The guilty ones were punished, and the murderers were executed. Although there is peace there now, there may be a new insurrection of the natives at any time.

A Christmas Gift to India

THE X-Ray machine, for which Dr. Alice B. Condict appealed to our readers in behalf of the sufferers from cancer and leprosy in India, is now on the way to Bombay, where it will doubtless arrive during the present month. It will come to the hospital workers at Ludhiana as a most welcome Christmas gift from the readers of this journal. These contributions have been received:

Next time you find you have eaten rather too heartily, or have been eating the wrong things, try just a dish of "FORCE" with cream and nothing else for the next meal or two, and see how it straightens you out inside.

Notice, too, how it clears your head for problems that call for close figuring.

I have made a lot of friends by getting them to try that experiment.

In the delicate but thorough steam-cooking process which brings the malted "FORCE" to the flaking stage, great care is taken (and great care is necessary) to preserve a certain percentage of active diastase.

That's one difference between "FORCE" and the numberless "others"—and it's all the difference in the world to your digestive machinery.

Questions and Answers

M. S. C., Medford, Mass. Can you give me some information regarding the origin of mistletoe being used at Christmastime for decoration, and what started the custom of kissing under the "mistletoe bough"?

The mistletoe was deemed sacred by the Druids, who were the priests of the Celts of Gaul and Britain, and its use at Christmas can be traced back to these ancient times when it was supposed to possess miraculous powers. Kissing under the mistletoe comes from a Scandinavian mythological tale: A wicked spirit, Leoki, hated Balder, the favorite of the gods, and making an arrow of mistletoe, gave it to Hader, the blind god of darkness, to test. He shot the arrow, and killed Balder, who was restored to life, and the mistletoe given to the goddess of love to keep. Everyone passing under it received a kiss, as a proof that it was an emblem of love, and not of death.

Reader, Marysville, Pa. Yes, a State can enact State Prohibition by popular vote. The total vote for Swallow for President was over 300,000, the total in 1902 being 269,000.

Annie S. B., Bordentown, N. J. What is meant by Yule-tide and Yule-log?

Yule is an ancient name for the festival of Christmas, when it was celebrated with rites borrowed from the old sun-worship. The Yule-log was a large log of wood placed on the fire. In olden times, it was the custom in England, when the usual devotions were over on Christmas Eve, to light large candles and throw a huge log on the hearth fire, called the Yule-log or Christmas Block.

S. S. Patchogue, N. Y. Please explain what the "Kabbala" means?

The Kabbala (or Cabala) is the oral law of the Jews, handed down from father to son by word of mouth. Some of the rabbins are credited with the saying that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in the oral law, the angel Japhiel instructed Shem, and the angel Zedekiel instructed Abraham; that Moses was divinely instructed, and that from his time it has been transmitted orally.

Mrs. M., Mount Joy, Pa. "The sermon in this week's (Nov. 9) CHRISTIAN HERALD, 'The Submissive Life,' by Rev. John Timothy Stone, in its useful lessons and its heartfelt utterances, is heartily appreciated. I really never before understood what a submissive life meant. I feel and know that the good this sermon will do will never end, but be a perfect chain, helping persons to become happy, faithful Christians, telling them of the rest in Heaven—prepared for the faithful and true."

A. C. R., Los Angeles, Calif. Is the Gospel preached to all nations as a witness, and is Tibet not the last place to be preached to?

With the exception of Tibet, some few sections of Central Asia, and some parts of interior Africa, the Gospel, it is believed, has now been preached to the whole world.

M. J. D., Mobile, Ala. Why is it claimed that the apple is the foremost of all the fruits of the earth?

We have never heard of such a claim, but it is probably based on the fact that the apple is so prominent in legend and tradition, as the "Golden Apple of Discord," when Paris gave judgment that led to a great war; the golden apples of Hippomenes, by the use of which he outran Atalanta and won her as a wife; the sweet-bitter apples of Iskhar; the apple of perpetual youth held by Idun (in Scandinavian mythology); the beautiful apples of Sodom, like ashes to the taste; Prince Ahmed's apple, that could cure any disease; the "Apples of Paradise," etc.

J. H., New York, writes:

I have often wondered why the members of the different churches should be so sadly neglectful in one almost imperative duty as a Christian people. The one moment spent in a whole-souled, hearty handshake and one kind word of welcome will repay threefold for the loss of time. It is far more important that you make welcome the stranger, than to while away your time in being pleasant, gracious and chatty with fellow-members. I have attended many different churches, and have never seen this one element so sadly neglected as in New York City. If you would have your church grow and flourish, if you would fill the vacant pews, if you would win souls to Christ and add more jewels to the crown laid up for you in heaven, give the stranger a warm, fervent handshake and make him welcome in the house of God.

Reader, Waco, Tex. The hunting up of heirs to estates in England, Spain and elsewhere, is an industry that has been carried on very profitably by a certain class of shrewd and unscrupulous speculators. Don't pay out your money, and don't deal with anybody in such a matter, unless you act under the advice of a good, reputable lawyer.

Student, Rahway. Is the story of William Tell, true, or must we regard it as a myth, as some assert?

The same story, identical in every detail, is found in the ancient Scandinavian legend of Egil, whom King Nidung commanded to perform the same feat that is attributed to Tell.

Reader, Lexington, Ky. We do not know how the law regulates these matters in your State. According to the New York Penal Code, "the killing of a human being, unless excusable or justifiable, is murder." As to the degrees of murder, manslaughter, etc., you can only be accurately informed by one fully conversant with the law and the practice in your local courts.

Subscriber, Rochford, S. Dak. If a person commits a sin deliberately after he is converted, knowing it to be a sin, can he hope for forgiveness? Does not the warning in Heb. 10: 26 exclude him?

If a man after the commission of a sin, becomes sincerely penitent and pleads with God to forgive him for Christ's sake, we believe that he will be forgiven. We are assured (1. John 1: 7), that "the blood of Jesus cleanses from all sin." The passage you refer to, simply declares that there is no further sacrifice. He must rely on the one already made. It is that to which he must appeal. If he rejects that, he must be lost. There remains nothing but a fearful looking for of judgment. Of the same tenor, is a more pertinent passage Heb. 6: 4-6, which intimates that a man who thus sins does not often seek forgiveness. He becomes hardened and indifferent. But the truth remains that if, like Peter, he repents, he will be forgiven.

The "magic square" proposition of H. C. W., Lebanon, N. Y., has called forth a number of solutions of the four-square and five-square problems. We give a few of these below. M. J. E., Scranton, Pa., sends these solutions:

Mr. H. L. Crosly writes: "I have an old book in which these squares are all printed and described as belonging to the ancient Egyptians. They were engraved on metal plates and dedicated to the planets. The wearers imagined the square would, upon occasion, befriend the person carrying it. The following are some of the planets and squares dedicated to them:

To Saturn	9	places or cells, the side being 3, and the number in each row 15.
To Jupiter	16	squares, side 4, each row 34
To Mars	25	" " " " 5, " " 63
To the Sun	36	" " " " 6, " " 111
To Venus	49	" " " " 7, " " 175
To Mercury	64	" " " " 8, " " 260
To the Moon	81	" " " " 9, " " 369

Finally, they attributed to imperfect matter the square with 4 divisions having 2 for its side, and to God, the square of only one cell, the side of which is also an unit, which, multiplied by itself, undergoes no change.

Inquirer, Humbird, Wis. 1. What do modern theologians think of Milton's Paradise Lost? Should it be read as teaching great truths or as a masterpiece of literature? 2. How do you explain the deity of Christ? Was he the only God that ever existed?

1. It was not inspired, other than as every poet is inspired with the spirit of poetry. Its statements are in no sense authoritative. Milton was of a highly imaginative temperament. His work gives his view of the events described in Genesis, putting in dramatic form and amplifying the narrative. Like Shakespeare's Julius Caesar and Richard III., he puts into the mouth of his characters such sentiments as they might be supposed to express. 2. We have only the statements of the Bible to guide us. He himself spoke of his Father in heaven and prayed to him, which proves the existence of the Father. He came as the Revealer of God, and was the express image of his person. "In him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead bodily," John tells us that "the Word became flesh," and when he was about to ascend he said: "I ascend to my Father and to my God." God is a spirit, incomprehensible to human understanding, but Jesus, coming in human form, filled with the spirit of God, revealed him to the world.

Inquirer, Memphis, Tenn. Wood alcohol is a virulent narcotic poison, which acts with great rapidity upon the lungs and heart. Sometimes a single large dose is suddenly fatal, although the victim usually lingers for hours or days in agony. It first destroys the lining membrane of the stomach, then attacks the kidneys and then the heart and lungs, which is followed by collapse.

W. S. E. Eacony, Phila. In Philadelphia, we rather closely observe the Sunday law; but the small storekeepers and the working classes are striving to have the laws repealed, some of the workers saying we rob them of their liberty. Now I contend, that if the law is repealed, the first thing to be done by the foreign element will be to keep open store, and the next thing will be that employers will make the workmen work seven days a week, thereby taking away their liberty.

Apart from all other considerations, it is a sad piece of folly for the workers or any class to attempt to do away with Sabbath observance, because, if they succeeded, they would simply be forging fetters to bind themselves more closely to toil—without cessation and with no increase in emolument. The "rest-day," is in itself a beneficent and necessary institution. Divine wisdom, in instituting the Sabbath as a day of rest, in which no work, except such as was of necessity or of mercy, was to be done, recognized the need of a respite from physical toil. It is the day of the higher intellectual and spiritual activities, when man's better nature is strengthened and refreshed, and his wearied body reinvigorated. A nation with no Sabbath, would be one of low ideals and no religion, and its decline would be only a matter of time.

S. S., Memphis, Tenn. Where did the phrase "the almighty dollar" originate?

Washington Irving first made use of the expression in his sketch of A Creole Village, written in 1837.

Sarah E. R., Farmingdale, Ill. I have seen a pamphlet, purporting to be a copy of a letter written by Pontius Pilate to Caesar at Rome, giving a history of three years' ministry, trial, death, burial and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Is it really believed to have been written by Pontius Pilate?

You have probably seen a portion of one of the "spurious Gospels," as a number of unauthentic writings were called which circulated during the early days of the Church. One of these is called the Gospel of Nicodemus, or Acts of Pilate, and contains what you have described. One chapter (the 27th), says that Pilate himself wrote all the story from the relation of Nicodemus. The book was held in esteem in the Middle Ages, although it was among those that were rejected by the great church councils before the close of the fourth century and is still regarded as uncanonical by the Christian Church.

Zenas B., Columbus, O. Please give some little account of the beginning of the Epworth League. How, where, and when it was formed?

The Epworth League is a society of young people of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It was formed in Cleveland, O., in May, 1889, by the union of five societies connected with the Methodist Church. The motto of the society is "Look Up—Lift Up." Its object is the promotion of intelligent and loyal piety in the young members and friends of the church. A pledge is required of the members of the league to help others, and to endeavor to attain the highest New Testament standard of experience and life. The league has grown rapidly, and has branches in many foreign countries. It has an aggregate membership of 1,100,000.

Anna M., Charles City, Ia. Can you tell me something of the author of the song entitled "Ben Bolt"?

The author of this popular ballad was Thomas Dunn English, who was born in Philadelphia, June 29, 1819. He was a graduate of a medical college, also studied law, and was also admitted to the bar. From 1844 to 1859 he was engaged in journalism in New York. He was a member of the State Assembly in 1863-64, and of Congress in 1891-1895. Mr. English died April 1st, 1902.

H. H. A., Abilene, Tex. Did Mary grasp Christ's feet, as stated in Matthew 28: 9, or was she restrained, as stated in John 20: 17? Why, in the latter case, did Christ prohibit her touching him?

The statement in John seems to be incomplete. Mary, being addressed by name, probably threw herself at Christ's feet, though John does not say so. Christ's words, "Touch me not," seem to imply that she did touch him, or was about to do so. The prohibition has occasioned much discussion. The most probable explanation of it is, that Christ wished Mary to understand that the old terms of familiar friendship were changed. The passage through death and the grave had made physical contact painful to him. He would be all and more than all to his followers that he had been, but henceforth he was to be worshiped. He was still on earth, he had not yet ascended, but he had begun his resurrection life and was no longer on the plane of human familiarity.

E. P., Oxford, Pa. Does the Bible teach that baptism and church membership are essential to salvation?

They are commands, and as such the Christian should obey them. We can imagine circumstances in which it might be impossible to obey them, as in cases of conversion during a serious illness, or in a country far away from a church, or where sudden death ensues before obedience can be rendered. We do not for a moment believe that in any case of the kind, a man would be rejected for not having joined a church or been baptized. But so simple and plain a duty ought not to be neglected by any one who desires to please Christ, when it can be performed. He ought not to ask whether he will be punished for disobeying. It should be his delight to do any duty required of him.

Emma, Meriden, Conn. Japan averages 1,400 earthquakes yearly (according to the National Geographic Magazine), but of these, less than fifty are perceptible and only a few dangerous to life or property. In twenty-nine years there have been fifteen violent earthquakes there, the greatest being that of 1891, in which 7,000 persons perished, 17,000 were injured, and 20,000 buildings were destroyed.

Old Subscriber, E. E. A few weeks ago you published the hymn "Higher Ground." Some one inquired where the hymn could be obtained. It is to be found in a little book Songs of Praise and Salvation, sold by the Christian Witness Co., 151 Washington Street, Chicago, and 36 Bromfield Street, Boston. These sacred songs were used the two last years at Beulah Camp Meeting, held every summer at a delightful spot on the St. John River, about twenty miles from the city of St. John, N. B.

A Consecrated Boulder

HALF-WAY up a rocky ledge that shelters the village of Bethel, Conn., from the piercing east winds, is a singular-looking boulder that is reached only by going through the village cemetery. The few trees and bushes that have managed to strike root and live there, completely encircle the rock, making it an inviting retreat on a hot summer day. It was for years the resort of gamblers, who found it an ideal spot in which to carry on their evil practices unmolested.

of some familiar hymn wafted across the cemetery, and wives and daughters, resting on the piazzas at close of day, often join in, with tears in their eyes.

What has brought about this marvelous change? One woman, with a Gospel message, found her way there. A few heard her at first; but the message spoken with such clearness and simplicity soon won hearers. The gamblers' rock near the cemetery was soon deserted, and the faces that had once been bent over the cards

A PRAYER AND-PRAISE SERVICE AT THE BOULDER

The story of the hard-earned wages that changed hands there, bringing unearned luxuries to some families, want to others, and increasing prosperity to the village rum-seller, will never be fully told; but there are families who can still trace years of misery to the orgies that were carried about that secluded boulder. But the scene has changed. Men still gather there, but not to gamble. One by one, they rise and tell what God has done for them, how He has taken away the desire for drink and cards. Then they sing the praises of God, until their voices can be heard a mile away. The village people hear the strains scattered over its surface, were now uplifted to the earnest speaker, who reproved, entreated and exhorted from the village churches. The conviction her words awakened was not permitted to die out. One by one, the gamblers were won to Christ.

It was afterwards suggested that they return to the rock and consecrate it to God, and this was done. Many others joined their ranks. The rum-sellers hoped the tide would once more turn their way, but their hope was vain. Bethel is now a "no-license" town, as the indirect but natural sequence of this revival. H. K.

A Mother's Prayer Answered

JOHN H. was born in Central New York, more than forty years ago. He came of respectable and well-to-do parents. His father had served all through the Civil War, and had returned at its close with an honorable record; but his health was so shattered, that when he reached the old farm in the summer of 1865, he was only a shadow of his former self.

When John was only nine years old, his mother, who was his earliest and truest friend, passed to the better land. Before she breathed her last, she called her boy to her bedside, and lovingly committed him to God in prayer, yearning over him only as a mother could in the fervency of her love. She prayed that God in his covenant mercy might make him his child, and that they would meet in heaven at last. Her last words were, "John, promise me that you will meet mother in the city of the great King."

John was cared for by an aunt till he came to manhood. After leaving school, he went into business, and soon afterwards went West. He prospered, but became reckless and wild. After a time, he participated in the scenes of revelry and drunkenness, which were too common on the frontier in those days; but wherever he went, or however dark were his pleasures, he never could forget the scene at his mother's death-bed, nor the promise he had solemnly made. Often he awoke at night and felt that obligation resting upon him, and yet it remained unfulfilled. He went on for many years living a wild and checkered life. He imbibed infidel views, and became dissipated in his habits. A few years ago he became addicted to strong drink. It fastened itself upon him to such an extent that his future prospects were blasted. He tried various cures, but all to no purpose—human cure could not reach his case. Sin had dominated his life too long to be driven out by a nostrum. When he saw there was no help for him, he became melancholy and left home unknown to his friends, determined to take his own life. He visited Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans, and finally came to New York. It was a cold, blustering day in December when he came. He went to a small hotel in the lower part of the city, where he hired a room. He had been drinking for three months, but now he thought the end was at hand. He pledged a diamond ring, which gave him ready money with which to purchase a deadly weapon and a bottle of whiskey. All day long he contemplated self-destruction, but every time he laid his hand on the pistol, something within said, "John, you're not ready yet." The landlord's suspicions were aroused, and he had him arrested. Next morning I saw him in prison and conversed with him. He looked the picture of despair; his eyes were like balls of fire, his hair stood upright, and his clothes were dirty and soiled. I said to him, "My friend, give your heart to God. He is your only help." He replied, "It is too late for me!" "But it is not too late for God," I replied. Then we knelt and prayed. It was the cry of the penitent, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." He broke down and wept. That moment was the turning-point of his life. Next day I went to the magistrate and procured his discharge. I then took him to a home in the city, where he stayed some days. He got a position, and united with a church. He afterwards took a class in the Sunday School. I saw him a few days ago. He is still going on in the Christian life. His conversion was due to a Christian mother's prayers.

"For 36 Years a Standard Piano"

A Wing Style, 45 Other Styles to Select from

WING PIANOS

Sold Direct from the Factory—

And In No Other Way

WHEN you buy a WING PIANO, you buy at wholesale. You pay the actual cost of making it with only our wholesale profit added. When you buy a piano as many people do—at retail—you pay the retail dealer's store rent and other expenses; you pay his profit and you pay the commission or salary of the agents or salesmen he employs.

The retail profit on a piano is never less than $75; often it is as much as $200. This is what you save by buying a WING PIANO direct from the factory. Isn't it worth saving?

Our plan of selling is not an experiment but a great success. In 36 years over 38,000 Wing Pianos have been manufactured and sold. They are recommended by seven Governors of States; by musical colleges and schools; by prominent orchestra leaders; music teachers and musicians.

Every WING PIANO is guaranteed for 12 years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship or material.

SENT ON TRIAL

.... WE PAY FREIGHT
NO MONEY IN ADVANCE

We will place a WING PIANO in any home in the United States on trial without asking for any advance payment or deposit. We pay the freight and other charges in advance. If the piano is not satisfactory after twenty days' trial in your home, we take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing and are under no more obligations to keep the piano than if you were examining it at our factory. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you. Old instruments taken in exchange.

Small, Easy Monthly Payments

Special Features

Some of the special features which make the WING PIANO better than others are as follows: "Built up" wrist plank construction; "dovetail" top and bottom frame construction; overstrung concert grand scale with extra long strings and latest sounding board area, giving great volume and power of tone; double lever grand repeating action; patent "capstan" regulating device; "iron twisting" hammer shanks; noiseless "direct motion" pedal action; metal key bed support; extra heavy metal plate; metal depression bar; sound board of Canadian spruce selected for vibrating qualities; cases of quarter sawed lumber throughout, double veneered with choicest Curassian walnut, figured mahogany and quartered oak; full length diet music desk; patent practice clavier.

Instrumental Attachment

imitates perfectly the tones of the mandolin, guitar, harp, zither and banjo. Music written for these instruments, with and without piano accompaniment, can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by an orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us, and it cannot be had in any other piano.

WING ORGANS

are made with the same care and sold in the same way as WING PIANOS. Separate organ catalogue sent on request.

A Book You Need—Free

If you intend to buy a piano, you need the "Book of Complete Information About Pianos," which we publish, so I will send free if you write for it. It tells everything that anyone can possibly want to know about pianos. It is wonderfully full, and it is the only book of its kind ever published. You can have it free if you send us your name and address.

Intervention in the Russo-Japanese War

ACCORDING to a recent letter published by a leading military expert, there should be no intervention between Russia and Japan: we should all stand meekly aside, and give the Russians "fair play." It is none of our business—and this scientific expert in military butchery, refers to our own position during the Spanish-American controversy, when foreign powers might have intervened, and indicates that we would have resented such interference most vigorously.

It is no doubt presumption, on the part of an obscure thinker, to question the conclusions of an eminent military authority; but this is not the barbaric age—this is not even a military age—this is not the tenth century, but the twentieth. There are thousands of people waking up now-a-days to the fact that their cherished creeds and conclusions, even their avocations, are obsolete. The world moves, and the traditions and superstitions of yesterday are dispelled by the progressive light of to-day. Hannibal, Caesar, and Napoleon lived and revelled in a carnival of blood, and the people of their day applauded, and successive generations deified them; but the acclamations are growing fainter and weaker as the years roll by, because a revolution has occurred in public sentiment. Education, and 1,900 years of Christianity, with its "forgive your enemy," and "love thy brother as thyself," have worked a miraculous change upon the spectators, and they no longer relish nor applaud a sickening carnage. The cheer has turned to a hiss, and the pompous, vainglorious, gold-mounted military puppet, has been replaced by a cultured, high-minded, enlightened, Christian gentleman, known as a humanitarian; who says that God created all mankind, black, brown, white and yellow; that rank, distinction, or difference is but the accident of birth; that human life is a sacred possession, and that he who destroys it wantonly should be execrated, while the highest mission vouchsafed unto man is to save life, and to improve it.

No wonder Gen. Gold Lace wants "fair play"—he is being gradually relegated to the back of the stage. His ghastly implements are no longer popular with the better element of mankind, the "still small voice" has silenced the cannon's roar, the Hague Tribunal threatens his very professional existence, and each day brings added proof that he is more and more like Othello, with his occupation gone. This is not an age of destruction, but of creation. Life is revered and precious. It is God-given, and sacred, and not something to be ruthlessly sacrificed to uphold the selfish personal ambitions of a self-elected minority.

A few leaders, members of the aristocracy or nobility, disagree, and anon ten thousand men pour out their heart's blood, after which the dispute is settled. Often there is no principle involved; there is no universal benefit derived, only the few reap the reward for which thousands have died. It is the act of a child—the supremest folly.

Why cannot the settlement precede the sacrifice? The Hague Tribunal makes such a result possible; but until mankind evolves a little farther, there must be an "Army of Enforcement," made up from all the nations of the earth, which would probably never be called upon to strike a single blow. After a few years even this could be dispensed with. Again, what sane man would compare the Russo-Japanese conflict to our own war with Spain? The world knows that our war with Spain was an act of humanity; that it freed a struggling people; ended a war that had been waging bitterly for years; concluded centuries of oppression, injustice and suffering, and gave universal happiness to millions.

Every one knows that Russia is waging a war of conquest, aggression, and extermination; that a majority of her own people are bitterly opposed to the contest, and that tens of thousands of loyal husbands and loving fathers are laying down their lives to uphold the "prestige" of a semi-barbaric nobility, that for generations has been condemning innocent men to Siberian torture for speaking the truth. The common people have no grievance, yet they are made to think the "fatherland" assailed, and that they must shed their blood, if need be, in its defense.

And so, if not in the name of the Jap or the Russ, in the name of the spectators and of Christ and his humanity this conflict should be terminated immediately, before another drop of blood is spilled. The armies now in line of battle have already contended for a week with the loss of 60,000 men, and without material advantage to either combatant.

Shall this awful carnage be repeated—as it doubtless will be—when the United Powers could, by simply crying "Hands off!" stop the war without a blow? No innocent man should be forced to lay down his life for the "prestige" of an ancient, semi-barbaric and depraved nobility, the most of whom take precious good care to remain a long distance from the firing-line. War is rarely justified, and only when some grand, beneficent principle is involved. It must be something better than national pride or party hatred.

And even the cattle, grazing upon the plain, put an end to conflicts between their fellows. Who has not noticed this time and again?

Is, then, animal instinct superior to human judgment, that is highly developed and wears brass buttons?

New York City.

A. H. WILCOX.

My Mother's Sacred Book

"Hen Feibl Mawr Fy Mam," a quaint and well-known Welsh poem, composed by Rev. Jno. Phillips, and translated by Rev. J. M. Hughes, Emporia, Kans.

A THOUSAND times I hail thee,
O precious Book divine!
And to my heart, how lovely
Is every page of thine.
I had a faint idea,
Before I walked apace,
That mother's Bible was a thing
All sacred to the race.

More comely are thy pages,
With all their corners turned,
Than all the gilded edges,
With clasps of gold confirmed;
No disrespect did stain thee,
Nor cold neglect o'erlook;
The household's noblest treasure,
Was this old sacred book.

Thy pages in the morning,
And also every night,
My father read, and worshiped
In this, our altar-light.
But ah! death came one evening,
My parents dear he took,
Just I alone remaining,
With this old sacred Book.

I well remember mother,
When under trials sore;
And how she drew her comforts,
And strength from thee of yore;
When tossed with grief and anguish,
She always found a nook,
Where peace supreme was flowing
From this, her sacred Book.

Ah! Is there any mortal,
In guise of sacred line,
Who would withhold forever,
This Holy Book of mine?
O never dare to part us,
My soul you thus o'erlook;
My heart is bound forever
To this old sacred Book.

She gave me this, when dying;
How sweet her last request,
"Tie this now on thy bosom,
And wear upon thy breast!"
The stake I'll gladly cherish,
I'd die in seas of flame;
Before I would forsake thee,
Thou Holy Book of fame.

Dr. Hale's Reminiscences

AMID the multitude of books issued this season, it is pleasant and refreshing to find one so wholly different from all the others as the Memories of a Hundred Years, by Edward Everett Hale, just issued by the Macmillan Company. Dr. Hale's vivid literary style, his inexhaustible store of anecdote, his reminiscences of men and women whose careers are interwoven with the story of our nation's literary, social and political development, all combine to make this book one of unusual attractiveness to the student as well as to the general reader. The Memories (really two volumes in one) cover a wide range; and the reader finds himself, under Dr. Hale's entertaining guidance, in touch with many of those who have "made history"—statesmen, orators, historians, mean the bread which is sold at restaurants as Boston brown bread.

My father has been called, rightly enough, I think, the founder of the railroad system in New England. When I was a child, he made with his own hand a model of a railway, which stood in our parlor, that he might explain to visitors what he was talking about when he spoke of a rail or a flange or an inclined plane. As a child, I understood as well as I understand now the look of pity on people's faces as they left the room, thinking how sad it was that a man of as much sense as he should give himself up to such delusion. He forced the Legislature of Massachusetts to the formation of an Internal Improvement Commission, and, as a member of that Commission, he wrote its reports after the first. In earlier reports of the Internal Improvement Board, he had followed up in detail the success of Stephenson and of steam power in England. But I cannot but notice, that in their first report to their own stockholders the Worcester Railroad Directors do not even allude to steam power. It seems as if they would not introduce at a business meeting a subject which was still a matter of discussion; but the next report takes steam power almost for granted. And it was as early as 1828 that locomotive engines had been used in New Jersey, in Maryland, and in South Carolina.

Edward Everett said to me one day in the spring of 1846 that it was already long enough, since his return from Europe, for him to satisfy himself that the stately oration of twenty years before was for America a thing of the past. He advised me as a young man to accustom myself to speak without a manuscript, to accept the more colloquial habit, which I think he would have called the "habit of the stump." After this time he prepared some of his own most elaborate written addresses; but I doubt if he ever carried the manuscript abolitionists, warriors, journalists, and the like. Some of the glimpses afforded of the social life of those comparatively early days is delightful. On the other hand, Dr. Hale's stories of Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Martin Van Buren, Edward Everett, Bancroft, Hildreth and Prescott, the three historians, Washington Irving, Wm. Ellery Channing, Sumner, Lincoln, Emerson, Holmes, Longfellow, Lowell, and a host of others, are sure to be widely quoted and remembered. We are privileged to reproduce a few extracts from the Memories, which will interest all readers.

The daughter of a Massachusetts Senator told me that in her younger life she went with her father to one of the regulation dinners at the White House. General Jackson himself took her out to the dinner-table. There was some talk about the light of the table, and the General said to her, "The chandelier does not burn well." She was so determined that she should not misunderstand him that she pretended not to hear him, and asked him what he said. To which his distinct reply was, "The chandelier does not burn well."

When I was in college, the Josiah Quincy of that generation, the man who was born just before the Revolutionary Josiah Quincy died, told me something about the cereal food of Massachusetts in his boyhood. I knew perfectly well that his family was in as comfortable circumstances as any family in New England. He said that until his manhood, white bread, the bread made from wheat flour, was, so to speak, a luxury on his mother's table. I remember he said it was served as nice cake might be served in the average New England family of the time when we were speaking. His mother would have her loaf of white bread in the house, but it would be used, not as the substantial bread of the family, but as a sort of extra luxury at the table. The family food was "rye 'n' jun," as we Yankees say, by which we into the assembly where he was to speak. In an interview in his own beautiful library, when we were both fifteen years older, he said to me that in preparing an address he then never put on paper any bit of narrative. If you know what you are describing, you can tell it with most spirit if you are not in the least fettered. I might add that, with a memory like his, you might be sure to make no mistake as to the facts. But for a matter of persuasion, of logic, or argument in any form, he thought that this should be prepared in advance, with all the caution which is implied in the use of pen, ink, and paper. Thus, in his own address on George Washington, he did not write down the narrative of Braddock's defeat until he wrote it down for the printed edition. It was a new story to every audience. But the philippic against Mariborough, and the conclusion of the address, were, to the last letter, considered in advance. And though he never took the paper upon the stage, these were the same to every audience.

The poet Lowell had left college for a few months when he went into Boston, on the 9th of November, 1838, "to look out for a place in business." I think I never pass the rather grotesque Parthenon front of our old Court House in Boston without thinking of that walk of Lowell's, as he came through Cambridge Street into Court Street. Observe that at ten o'clock on that 9th of November he meant to go into mercantile life. "I was induced, en passant, to step into the United States District Court, where there was a case pending in which Daniel Webster was one of the counsel retained. I had not been there an hour before I determined to continue in my profession (of the law) and study as well as I could!" This was what happened to Lowell when he was nineteen years old. I may as well say here that he studied law seriously and to such purpose that when it came to be his turn to be a diplomatist in Spain and in England he knew perfectly well what he was about, and had no superior in his business. I tell that story because it shows the sort of impression which Mr. Webster made on all intelligent people.

There is a good anecdote which is perfectly well authenticated, that when he was delivering one of his great addresses, Mrs. Webster was in the gallery of the church, where she had taken Edward, my little friend, I suppose in order that he might remember hearing his father on a critical occasion. In the course of the address, Mr. Webster, in his most vigorous way, cried out, "Will any man dare say"—so that the child was himself impressed with the folly of any person contradicting his father, and in a clear voice he replied from the gallery, "No, Pa!"

It was to me a matter of the utmost personal surprise when I found, gradually growing up in this country, the impression that Mr. Webster was often, not to say generally, overcome with liquor in the latter years of his life. I should say that a third part of the anecdotes of him which you find afloat now have reference to occasions when it was supposed that, under the influence of whiskey, he did not know what he was doing. I like to say, therefore, that in the course of twenty-six years, running from the time I was four years old to the time I was thirty, I never had a dream or thought that he cared anything about wine or liquor—certainly I never supposed that he used it to excess.

In 1859 I made my first visit to Niagara, and, by way of picking up a dropped stitch, I went round by New York and the Hudson and stopped at Tarrytown, provided with the letter of introduction, now eighteen years old, and with another one given me by Edward Everett. Washington Irving was cordiality itself in his welcome of me and of a young friend who was my fellow-traveler. He showed us the places of historical interest around his beautiful Sunnyside, and, best of all, he talked with the greatest freedom of his work in history. I pleased him by telling him with how much pleasure I was reading aloud at home the closing volume of his "Life of Washington," and I said that he had the power, which few people have, of giving to diplomacy and matters of state the interest which is supposed to belong to adventure and to battle. This pleased him, and I remember he said that "rub-a-dub and roro-toro" were more apt to catch the ear than more quiet discussions of the Cabinet and of the Senate.

I have been amused and half provoked to find in some of the machine-made biographies of Motley, that his "History of the Dutch Republic," one of the world's standard histories to-day, was written as if by accident. It is told as if he drank his cup of coffee in the morning, and said, "What would you do to-day?" and somebody asked, "Why not write a history of the Dutch Republic?" and he said, "I think I will." The truth is, that he had been studying it for years; and when Prescott approached that subject, in the series of his histories, Motley explained to him how much time and effort he had given to it, and placed himself and his material wholly at Prescott's disposal. Holmes told me with the greatest pleasure once that Motley told him that two lines of Holmes's had been to him an inspiration and a direction. Motley had been living with his wife and his little children in one place and another in the Netherlands, so that he might read these time-stained manuscripts in crabbéd Dutch, in preparation for his history. You might say that nobody in the world cared for it. His old friends even wondered why he exiled himself. Dutch! Why should a man like Motley bother himself about Dutch! There and thus came the moments of depression and discouragement. Holmes said that Motley told him that once when he was all worn out in his work, these two lines braced him up and helped him through,

Stick to your aim: the mongrel's hold will slip,
But only crows loose the bulldog's grip.

Emerson, Holmes, Longfellow and Lowell were kindness itself to young authors. No one would believe me if I told how much time Holmes gave, day in and day out, to answer personally the requests of young people who submitted to him their verses. I am afraid he was too kind. Of Emerson, in the same business, it used to be said that all his geese were swans. He was always telling you about some rising poet who was going to astonish the world. I ought to tell of the welcome which Longfellow gave to every tramp who came to his door, if only the tramp happened to speak a foreign language. And no literary wayfarer, however crude and unsophisticated, knocked at Holmes' hospitable gate who was not made welcome.

Gospel Settlement Work

A DEMONSTRATION of class and club work of the Gospel Settlement at 211 Clinton Street, New York, was held at Clinton Hall, on the evening of November 22, 1904. This exhibition was an object lesson of the good work accomplished along educational lines by the workers in this settlement, which was founded by Mrs. Sarah J. Bird a few years ago. The neighborhood is one of the most congested of the crowded East Side, and the children who compose the various classes are almost entirely of Jewish blood. There is a Mothers' Club connected with the Settlement, and good work is being done in it. The Kitchen Garden includes much that is valuable in the home when its teachings are put into practical use.

The exhibition was most interesting, the music and recitations showed painstaking instruction on the part of the teachers, and in many instances exceptional talent among the pupils.

Dr. Klopsch addressed the meeting, saying that he felt quite at home, as he recognized a number of the children as having been at Mont-Lawn during the past summer. He said: "If love begets love, I wonder how much love, sympathy and kindly sentiment and good neighborly feeling is stirred up in these young hearts, month by month, and year after year by the loving influence of Mrs. Bird, Miss Irwin and the workers of the Gospel Settlement."

Dr. Klopsch told the story of the minister who had his study up in the steeple of his church, and whom the Lord called. When the minister asked, "Who's calling?" the answer came, "Come down." Then in reply to the inquiry, "Where art thou, Lord?" the Lord answered, "I am down here amongst my people."

Then came an account of Mrs. Bird's visiting Dr. Klopsch, and telling him that she intended to give up her home in the country and to come to live amongst the people of the East Side of the city. And after expressing his warm admiration of the efforts of Mrs. Bird, Miss Irwin, Mrs. Innes, and others, Dr. Klopsch closed by saying:

"God bless the Gospel Settlement! Every part of it, every worker in it, and every man, woman, and child who reaches out a helping hand to bring sunshine and joy into their fellow-creatures' lives."

I Doubled
My Salary
in Two Months

A FEW months ago I was a saleswoman earning $6.00 a week. Desiring to obtain more, I answered an advertisement of the Commercial Correspondence Schools of Rochester, New York, and accepted their offer to teach me bookkeeping free and place me in a position as soon as I was qualified to keep a set of books. At the start I knew absolutely nothing about bookkeeping, yet by the time I had completed my eighteenth lesson the schools procured for me my present position as head bookkeeper with a large manufacturing concern, at exactly double the salary I was formerly earning. I cannot say too much in favor of the thoroughly practical and yet simple course of instruction in bookkeeping taught by the Commercial Correspondence Schools. I could not have learned what I did in a business college course would not only have cost me $60.00, but I should have had to give up my daily employment to attend school. As it was, I studied in the evening, and earned my living during the day, and I did not pay one cent for instruction until I was placed in my present position. (Signed)

HAPPY CHILDHOOD

Right Food Makes Happy Children Because They are Healthy.

Sometimes milk does not agree with children or adults. The same thing is true of other articles of food. What agrees with one sometimes does not agree with others.

But food can be so prepared that it will agree with the weakest stomach. As an illustration—anyone, no matter how weak the stomach, can eat, relish and digest a nice hot cup of Postum Coffee with a spoonful or two of Grape-Nuts poured in, and such a combination contains nourishment to carry one a number of hours, for almost every particle of it will be digested and taken up by the system and be made use of.

A lady writes from the land of the Magnolia and the mocking bird way down in Alabama and says: "I was led to drink Postum because coffee gave me sour stomach and made me nervous. Again Postum was recommended by two well known physicians for my children, and I feel especially grateful for the benefit derived."

"Milk does not agree with either child, so to the eldest aged four and one half years, I give Postum with plenty of sweet cream. It agrees with her splendidly regulating her bowels perfectly although she is of a constipated habit."

"For the youngest aged two and one half years I use one half Postum and one half skimmed milk. I have not given any medicine since the children began using Postum, and they enjoy every drop of it."

"A neighbor of mine is giving Postum to her baby lately weaned, with splendid results. The little fellow is thriving famously." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum agrees perfectly with children and supplies adults with the hot, invigorating beverage in place of coffee. Literally thousands of Americans have been helped out of stomach and nervous diseases by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. Look in pkg. for the little book, "The road to Wellville."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

"The Gospels in Art"

TO students of Biblical pictures, or admirers of Christ in art, such a collection of illustrations as is shown in The Gospels in Art, should not fail to create interest and enthusiasm. However one may disagree with the conception or interpretation of the Gospel by the "old masters," if we could, in imagination, live in their times, surrounded by the difficulties in spite of which these masterpieces were created, we would probably give them at least full credit for sincerity in their work. It seems unnecessary to question their genius. The fact that many of the paintings reproduced in this volume are centuries old, and have from time to time inspired and encouraged modern artists, should give them the right to stand in the front rank of the world's sacred art.

The compiler of The Gospels in Art has succeeded in presenting to the public artistic works of not only many of the "old masters," but also the most representative paintings of our modern schools of art, gathered from the great galleries of Europe and representing every well-known art school, past and present.

Siegel Cooper Company has never done a better or a wiser thing in the production of books than in securing the American rights for the sale of this remarkable publication. It is a work that commends itself with equal force to the Biblical student and the art lover. This book is, in brief, a pictorial life of Christ. The whole story, from the Nativity to the Crucifixion, is told in reproductions of nearly four hundred paintings. That these are famous paintings is a matter of course, for what other subject has given to the painters of all schools and all periods an equal inspiration? Of the world's immortal pictures, almost all are religious.

The task of the compilers was almost as delicate as it was stupendous. No school of art and no famous painter through all the centuries, from Fra Angelico to Puvius de Chavannes, has been omitted. Yet such paintings as were notoriously drawn with sectarian bias, or with controversial spirit, have been excluded.

The text of The Gospels in Art is quite as remarkable as the illustrations. The introduction, entitled, "The History of Art in its relation to the Life of Jesus," was written by M. Leonce Bendite, Director of the Luxembourg, and undoubtedly one of the greatest living authorities on the works of the Old Masters. Rev. Henry Van Dyke, D.D., wrote the text which accompanies the pictures relating to the childhood of Jesus, while the division entitled "The Ministry of Jesus" is contributed by the Right Rev. G. A. Chadwick. The fourth division, entitled "From Gethsemane to Olivet"—a period which has given the inspiration for the greatest number of immortal pictures, has the accompanying text by the Rev. Robert F. Horton.

As a Christmas gift, it is hard to imagine anything more beautiful, interesting or appropriate than this artistic work. Not the least of its attractions is that while it is itself a veritable masterpiece of art in picture, reproduction and book-making, its price is reasonable and its terms of sale convenient. Details may be had by writing to Siegel Cooper Company, New York.

Travels in the Orient

Mrs. John P. Newman, the widow of the late Bishop Newman, was a delegate to the World's Sunday School Convention to Jerusalem in 1904. Mrs. Newman writes most entertainingly of the trip. The description of Christmas festivities at Bethlehem forms a very interesting chapter. "A Day in Bethany" includes a rather exciting experience with the persistent, ragged, and dirty little beggars, boys and girls, who fought and yelled over the coins given them, until the author acknowledges frankly that she lost her Christian temper, as she called to mind the story of bears and Elijah, so saucy and altogether unlovely were these small children. The little booklet is printed upon excellent paper, and would make a very appropriate Christmas remembrance. For sale at Methodist Book Room, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. Price 25 cents.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

"Now, I have shown you," said Miss Nonesuch to Mrs. Briggs, where our fine Louisiana sugar cane is grown and refined and placed in special barrels for shipment to the None Such Factories. You have seen that only the best sugar is good enough for us, and we use 70 barrels daily.

"In the warehouses of the big factories in Syracuse you will find thousands of barrels of this sugar."

"We will also show you all the other things that go into None Such Mince Meat—show you that they are equal to the foods that go to the tables of the most fastidious people in the country—and that everything is kept as clean as the finest kitchen in the land."

"We will show you just how all the ingredients are mixed by machinery in a manner that keeps them just as they ought to be, so that when you get a package of None Such Mince Meat you do not find what seems to be a lot of hash, but a mince meat that will really and truly make pies 'like mother used to make.'"

"And all the grocers keep it, don't they?" asked Mrs. Briggs.

"No," replied Miss Nonesuch, "they sell it." Last year they sold enough to make 24,000,000 pies."

Faith of Childhood

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray, thee, Lord, my soul to keep;"

Was my childhood's early prayer,
Taught by mother's love and care,
Many years since then have fled,
Mother slumbers with the dead.
Yet, methinks, I see her now,
With love-lit eye and holy brow,
As, kneeling by her side to pray,
She gently taught me how to say:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep."

Oh! could the faith of other days,
Oh! could the little hymns of praise,
Oh! could the simple, joyous trust,
Be recreated from the dust
That lies around a wasted life,
The fruit of many a bitter strife.

Oh! then at night in prayer I'd bend,
And call my God, my Father, Friend,
And pray, with childlike faith once more,
The prayer my mother taught of yore:
"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep."

23 Years' Work in Tuskegee

DURING the twenty-three years that the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute has been in existence, counting those who have finished the full course, together with the much larger number of those who have taken a partial course, but who have remained long enough to get into the spirit and methods of the Institution, we have sent out quite 6,000 men and women who are doing effective work, mainly in the South, as teachers both in the class-room and of the industries, as mechanics, and in domestic work. Practically all of our graduates are in demand even before they graduate, and a large proportion of our men and women are employed by Southern white people at an average daily wage that is nearly three times as great as that paid to the average ignorant, untrained colored man or woman. At the present time there are 1,243 students enrolled. The Institution has proven its right to exist and its claims upon the public.

Just now there are three urgent needs which I think the public would like to know about and assist in meeting: 1st. The annual cost of operating the Institution is $160,000. Of this amount, we can depend upon $69,933 from assured sources, leaving $90,067 to be raised through the gifts of friends. 2d. Increase of our endowment fund from its present figures, $1,030,553.28, to at least $3,000,000. 3d. $65,000 with which to build a new dining-hall—$19,000 of this amount now being in hand. No need of the school is more urgent than this one. The students will make the bricks and do most of the work on the building, so that the money would not only provide the building, but would give students the chance to earn money and learn a trade.

We shall be glad of money towards one or all of these purposes. The smallest sum will be gratefully received. Money sent to the school for these objects will enable the principal to spend a larger proportion of his time and strength on the school grounds and in the South, where his services are much needed.

SAPOLIO

AGAINST THE CANTEEN

A VIGOROUS protest against the restoration of the canteen to the Army posts, is made in a letter to the Army and Navy Journal by Inspector-General Noel Gaines of Kentucky. It is elicited by a report from Inspector-General Burton to the Secretary of War, in which he claims that "the canteen is a moral benefit to the Army, and its withdrawal leads to sickness and the commission of military offenses, desertion and other crimes, as well as impaired discipline, by driving the men to resort to low dives and grogeries that have sprung up like mushrooms around military reservations" since the canteens have been closed. Gen. Burton added that this opinion was the almost unanimous sentiment of the Army.

It is not surprising that an opinion so extraordinary as this should have drawn forth an indignant protest from some officer who knows the facts. Human nature in the Army is like human nature in civil life. As we well know, by sad experience, no one ever yet derived moral benefit from intoxicating liquor. It is contended by some physiologists, but denied by others, that physical benefit may come in some rare cases from their use, but this, so far as we know, is the first time that it has been claimed that a moral benefit has resulted from them. There is nothing moral about the traffic, and we have yet to learn how what is so productive of immorality in civil life can change its character in military life. The restoration of the canteen can never be granted on moral grounds, and the sooner its advocates cease to use an argument so utterly indefensible, the better. The question may be one of bad and worse. The soldier, deprived of the canteen may resort to the dive, which on many grounds is worse than the canteen; but they are degrees of vileness, and we must not characterize the canteen as good, when it is only a little less vile than its brother evil. Both are bad, and the dive is worse than the canteen.

Inspector-General Gaines places himself on unassailable ground when he contends that while the advocates of temperance are teaching the soldier that "the Kingdom of God planted in their hearts is the way to kill all desire for drink and all other evil, it is not right for our Government to be acting the part of the tempter, tempting them by handing out liquor to the very people being preached to. And when the people of a state or nation, or a goodly number thereof, have this Kingdom of God planted in their hearts, all officers chosen to administer the affairs of government will be men who have received from God the New Covenant, then of a certainty that government will not be the tempter to the people who give it existence."

Unhappily we have not yet reached so high an ideal in our system of government, either in civil or military life, but there is a lower ideal which ought to influence every officer. It is the testimony of Gen. Kitchen, of Gen. Roberts, and other officers of experience, that the soldier's efficiency is impaired by the use of intoxicating liquors, and that he is a better man and a more capable soldier when he abstains from them. He can bear the fatigue of a long march and endure the hardships of his life better without the liquor than with it. This is a consideration which ought to weigh with officers who know nothing of the New Covenant, but are concerned for the efficiency of our Army. The moral effect on the men may be put out of the discussion altogether. We know that is bad, and we are surprised that Gen. Gaines has not given us any testimony of the effects, with which he must be familiar.

The question really turns on whether it is right in principle, or wise, to recognize the soldier's desire for intoxicating drink and provide for it, lest he gratify it in a more objectionable way. The true way of dealing with the evil is not to gratify his desire, but to teach him that abstinence is the better course, that liquor taken even in the canteen injures and demoralizes him. The Government ought not, by act or deed, to make itself a party to his undoing. It should steadily set its face against the drinking habit in the Army, as a menace to its efficiency, and not endorse it by paltering with its indulgence.

THE WONDERFUL MISSION

INTERNAL BATHby means of the
J. B. L. CASCADE

Do you know that many of the greatest physicians endorse and prescribe the "J. B. L. CASCADE" treatment? Also that the following distinguished people are among its patrons: Ex-Governor Goodell of Vermont, U. S. Senator A. P. Gorman of Maryland, Rear Admiral Barrall of Philadelphia, Judge Dessar, New York, Judge Casey of Missouri, Dr. John Potts, Victoria College, Toronto, Can., Rev. W. L. Strange, New Plymouth, Idaho, and hosts of others? Do you know that it goes to the root of and eradicates scores of the most troublesome and dangerous diseases that afflict mankind? Do you know that an occasional Internal Bath is a better preventive of illness and preserver of health than any other single means?

The record of its benefits reads like a revelation to those hitherto unacquainted with it. It is used by means of the "J. B. L. CASCADE," the only scientific appliance for this purpose, by hundreds of the best people in New York and by innumerable ministers, lawyers, and other persons whose intelligence gives unequivocal weight to their testimony.

It is known that seven-tenths of all diseases arise from the retention of foreign matter in the human system; also that the greatest part of this waste is held in the colon, which is Nature's sewer. Hence the flushing of this sewer removes the greatest cause for disease. While immeasurably the best treatment for constipation, indigestion, etc., there is scarcely any known disease for which the "J. B. L. CASCADE" may not be confidently prescribed.

We want to send FREE to every person, sick or well, a simple statement setting forth this treatment. It contains matter which must interest every thinking person. If you cannot call send for our "hygienic booklet," "The What, the Why, the Way," which will be sent FREE upon application, together with the great special offer to the readers of The Christian Herald.

RENOUNCES the Catholic Faith

MISS MARY GWENDOLIN CALDWELL, who, several years ago, excited attention by giving one-third of her large fortune to the Catholic Church, to found the Catholic University of Washington, has formally renounced Romanism and become Protestant. Her story is a remarkable one, and it conveys a lesson which those who are disposed to lend an ear to the proselyting methods of the Romish Church may well heed.

Miss Caldwell was born in Kentucky, her father Wm. S. Caldwell, being a wealthy contractor. Before his death, he became a convert to the Catholic faith, and his two little daughters, Mary and Lena, were taken in charge by a Catholic relative and placed in a convent school near New York City, where they were educated and reared as Catholics. Miss Mary and her sister, after their graduation, traveled in Europe, and, on returning to the United States, prepared to take an active part in the gay life of society. In 1887 Miss Mary became engaged to Prince Joachim Napoleon Murat, grandson of Murat, the King of Naples, and of Caroline, sister of Napoleon I. Suddenly, at the last moment, because the titled suitor demanded half of the lady's fortune to be settled upon him, the match was abandoned, and the bride gave her costly trousseau to the Catholic Church "for vestments." In 1892, she was united in marriage to the Marquis de Moustiers-Meriville.

It now seems that the lady, with mature judgment and wider experience, has become convinced of the unwisdom of the step by which her father, leaving the Protestant faith of his ancestors, allowed himself and his children to be swept into the fold of Rome. Mr. Caldwell was a wealthy man and his children were rich after his death. Flattered and praised by crafty advisers, they were easily persuaded to what followed. When Miss Mary Gwendolin came of age, and turned over $300,000 to the Church of Rome to build a University, the Pope sent her the "Order of the Rose" (a very great honor), and also a medal studded with diamonds, and specially made for the purpose. She gave to the church eighty-eight acres of land on the outskirts of Washington, erected three of the largest buildings and provided for the maintenance of the institution for several years. Her sister gave a sum of money to build a chapel for the university.

For some time past, the Marquis Meriville has been an invalid, traveling abroad. A few days ago a letter was received, in which she is quoted as saying:

"Yes, it is true that I have left the Roman Catholic Church. Since I have been living in Europe, my eyes have been opened to what that Church really is, and to its anything but sanctity. But the trouble goes much further back than this. Being naturally religious, my imagination was early caught by the idea of doing something to lift the Church from the lowly position which it occupied in America, so I thought of a university, or higher school, where its clergy could be educated, and, if possible, refined. In this I was greatly influenced by Bishop Spalding, of Peoria, who represented it as one of the greatest works of the day. When I was twenty-one, I turned over to them one-third of my fortune for that purpose. But for years I have been trying to rid myself of the subtle yet overwhelming influence of a church which pretends not only to the privilege of being the only true church, but of being alone able to open the gates of heaven to a sorrowful, sinful world."

"At last, my honest Protestant blood has asserted itself, and I now forever repudiate and cast off 'The Yoke of Rome.'"

This renunciation of Rome by one who formerly stood so high in the church's favor, is most significant.

Elisha's Ministry

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE ministry of Elisha was signally one of mercy and blessing. No sooner had he returned from the sight of an open heaven—when the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof appeared to him, and Elisha was caught up by a whirlwind into heaven—than he was made God's instrument in healing the nauseous waters of the city of Jericho. Later on he acted as God's instrument to succor a poor widow, as Elisha had been in his day; both of them such a type of Him who came as the express image of his Father, "the God of the widow;" and he was like Elisha, as God's instrument in raising the dead; again a type of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. In his dealings with the noble Syrian leper, he again reminds us of Him who, when on earth, could cleanse the leprosy, after He had healed the poisoned porridge and multiplied the loaves, in all foreshadowing the coming Messiah.

This prophet, in danger of his life from the Syrians, was in perfect calm, knowing that he was under the protection of God's invisible hosts; and in danger of his life from the king of Israel, sitting calmly in his house and prophesying that on the morrow the sore famine in the besieged city of Samaria would be at an end; and how, through the four lepers, the Word of God, through him, was fulfilled. But Elisha's ministry was not yet ended. Ahab had died the death of the wicked, to await his sentence at the great white throne, his son Ahaziah had gone to join him, and Elisha had outlived them both. He was a man whose tender consideration was most marked all through his career. When the woman of Shunem had built him his little quiet chamber on the wall of her house, he had called Gehazi to give him counsel what could be done for her. He had nothing to give in kind, but he knew how to fall back on God's resources; and the birth of her son was God's reward and the prophet's thanksgiving to this hospitable woman.

The next ministry of the prophet was in Syria. Benhadad the king was sick at Damascus. God had commanded Elisha to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, but the time did not come before Elisha's translation, and it devolved upon Elisha. Undoubtedly now God had told him things were ripe. There seems to have been nothing else which called him to Syria at this time. "It was told Benhadad that the man of God was come to the city. And he sent Hazael to the prophet, saying, Take a present in thine hand, and go, meet the man of God, and inquire of the Lord by him, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?" Elisha's answer was a strange one, "Go, and say unto him, Thou mayest certainly recover; howbeit the Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die. And he settled his countenance steadfastly till he (Hazael) was ashamed." The man of God had read his thoughts of murder; God had not hid from Elisha what he would do. "And the man of God wept." Hazael inquired why he wept, and then Elisha told him what God had revealed to him of the horrors of war, which his people, the Lord's people, should suffer at his (Hazael's) hands. Hazael did not know his own heart. "What," he said, "is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Elisha knew that the iniquity of Israel was fast coming to the full, and that Hazael was to be one of the scourgers in God's hand of judgment upon them, and he answered, "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria." And the unhappy man went to his master with the message which he had altered thus: "He told me that thou shouldest (not mayest) certainly recover." But on the morrow, taking advantage of the king's state of weakness, he smothered him with a thick cloth, and reigned in his stead. This ministry of Elisha must have been the most difficult. Oh, how he must have learned to leave to God the responsibility of all which he had commanded. It must have been a sore thing for Elisha when he grew old and looked back on his life's ministry, which had helped so many, to see that on the whole iniquity did not decrease, but continued to increase, among the people of the Lord. Oh, how many prophets, oh, how many witnesses of the Lord in every age have had the same sickening at heart! In every age "the whole world lieth in wickedness" (1 John 5:19).

Let this Machine do your Washing Free.

There are Motor Springs beneath the tub. These springs do nearly all the hard work, when once you start them going. And this washing machine works as easy as a bicycle wheel does. There are slats on the inside bottom of the tub. These slats act as paddles, to swing the water in the same direction you revolve the tub. You throw the soiled clothes into the tub first. Then you throw enough water over the clothes to float them. Next you put the heavy wooden cover on top of the clothes to anchor them, and to press them down. This cover has slats on its lower side to grip the clothes and hold them from turning around when the tub turns. Now, we are all ready for quick and easy washing. You grasp the upright handle on the side of the tub and, with it, you revolve the tub one-third way round, till it strikes a motor-spring. This motor-spring throws the tub back till it strikes the other motor-spring, which in turn throws it back on the first motor-spring. The machine must have a little help from you, at every swing, but the motor-springs, and the ball-bearings, do practically all the hard work. You can sit in a rocking chair and do all that the washer requires of you. A child can run it easily full of clothes.

When you revolve the tub the clothes don't move. But the water moves like a mill race through the clothes. The paddles on the tub bottom drive the soapy water THROUGH and through the clothes at every swing of the tub. Back and forth, in and out of every fold, and through every mesh in the cloth, the hot soapy water runs like a torrent. This is how it carries away all the dirt from the clothes, in from six to ten minutes by the clock. It drives the dirt out through the meshes of the fabrics WITHOUT ANY RUBBING, without any WEAR and TEAR from the washboard. It will wash the finest lace fabric without breaking a thread, or a button, and it will wash a heavy, dirty carpet with equal ease and rapidity. Fifteen to twenty garments, or five large bed-sheets, can be washed at one time with this "1900" Washer. A child can do this in six to twelve minutes better than any able washer-woman could do the same clothes in TWICE the time, with three times the wear and tear from the washboard.

This is what we SAY, now how do we PROVE it? We send you our "1900" Washer free of charge, on a full month's trial, and we even pay the freight out of our own pockets. No cash deposit is asked, no notes, no contract, no security.

You may use the washer four weeks at our expense. If you find it won't wash as many clothes in FOUR hours as you can wash by hand in EIGHT hours you send it back to the railway station, — that's all.

But, if, from a month's actual use, you are convinced it saves HALF the time in washing, does the work better, and does it twice as easily as it could be done by hand, you keep the machine.

Then you mail us 50 cents a week till it is paid for. Remember that 50 cents is part of what the machine saves you every week on your own, or on a washer-woman's labor. We intend that the "1900" Washer shall pay for itself and thus cost you nothing.

You don't risk a cent from first to last, and you don't buy it until you have had a full month's trial.

Could we afford to pay freight on thousands of these machines every month, if we did not positively KNOW they would do all we claim for them? Can you afford to be without a machine that will do your washing in HALF THE TIME, with half the wear and tear of the washboard, when you can have that machine for a month's free trial, and let it PAY FOR ITSELF? This offer may be withdrawn at any time it overcrows our factory.

Write us TODAY, while the offer is still open, and while you think of it. The postage stamp is all you risk. Write me personally on this offer, viz.: R. F. Bieber, General Manager of "1900" Washer Company, 340 North Henry St., Binghamton, New York.

Conditions of Salvation*

PEOPLE who have the idea that Christianity consists in accepting Christ, as a Saviour from future punishment, should be disabused of the idea, by Christ's own statement of his requirements. Mere intellectual assent to the truths of the Gospel is not the faith that saves. When Paul assured the Philippian jailer that if he believed on the Lord Jesus Christ he would be saved, he did not mean that believing that Jesus had lived, and had died on the cross, and risen again, would save him. There are thousands in our day, who have no doubt of those facts, and yet are not saved. It is quite true that men are saved by faith, but it is a faith that transforms character that saves. It does not imply good works. A man might exercise that faith in the last hour of his life, when death would preclude him from the performance of good works. The quality of his faith is the one essential consideration. That it will produce good works is certain, if it is genuine faith, but it is faith, not works, that saves. The works are only an indication that his faith is genuine.

The demand for faith is not a new thing in the world; it is required in many relations. A boy entering school desiring to become a scholar, trusts his teacher. He places himself in his teacher's hands, to be guided in his studies. If he sets up his own opinions in opposition to those of his teacher, and has his own ideas of the kind of education that is best for him, or of what his habits in the school should be, the teacher can do little for him. He must drop his opposition and obey. A patient who is anxious to recover from some critical disease, must follow his physician's directions. A prisoner on trial places his case in his lawyer's hands and proceeds under his advice. If he does not trust the lawyer, he is a client for whom little can be done. There is no mystery about such matters. Every one understands what faith means in our ordinary relations. It is simply the confidence that we place in the power of another to help us.

When a man becomes conscious that his soul is in danger of being lost; when he realizes that he has been disobeying God and has been living in opposition to him, and longs to be set right, Christ invites him to place his case in his hands, and assures him that if he does so sincerely and unreservedly, he will undertake that he shall be not only forgiven for past offenses, but be delivered from the power of sin. The conditions are fair and reasonable. He must submit himself to Christ's will and place implicit confidence in him. That is the act of faith which is indispensable. When the sinner is brought to that point, he becomes a Christ's man, or a Christian. His whole attitude is changed and from that time forward he is a new man. He turns his back on sin and the world and steadfastly works with Christ for his own development. It is not required of him before coming to Christ that he be good. On the contrary, he comes to be made good. The worst cases are accepted. None are so bad that Christ will reject them.

Then there are rules to be followed by those who have thus become Christians. As Christ has shown his love by dying for them, they must love one another. They must keep his commandments as he kept the commandments of his Father. In short, they must follow his example. And they must bear fruit. Their lives must be such as will attract others to his kingdom, and they must strive to serve Christ and seek to save others as they have been saved. To all these Christ promises the help of the Holy Spirit. They are not left to fight the battle with their own nature and with temptation in their own strength. They are expected to struggle, and are warned that their path will not be an easy one; but they are assured that they will receive strength as it is needed, and that if they trust in Christ victory is certain. With all this he promises that he will be with them in all their struggles, and will love them with an everlasting love, and in the end will receive them to himself.

H. C. Van Valkenburg, Providence, R. I., writes: "I don't believe any person ever had muscular rheumatism as bad as I have had it and recovered so quickly, for which I thank your Magic Foot Drafts."

Letters from the above and many thousands of other relieved patients are on file in our offices, where anyone can see them.

We want the name and address of every sufferer from rheumatism. Write us to-day. Return mail will bring you—free to try—a pair of the famous Magic Foot Drafts, the great Michigan discovery which is relieving all kinds of rheumatism, chronic or acute. If you are satisfied with the benefit received from the Drafts, send us one dollar. If not, keep your money. You decide.

The Drafts are worn on the feet because the largest pores are there; but they relieve rheumatism in every part of the body—to stay relieved—because they absorb the acid impurities from the blood through these pores, and reach the entire nervous system through the extremely sensitive nerve centers of the feet. Don't suffer needlessly, but send your name to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Co., R. A 10 Majestic Bldg., Jackson Mich. The Drafts, together with our splendid new free book on rheumatism, will come by return mail. Send no money—only your name. Write to-day.

A Talk with Japan's Premier

AN AMERICAN'S INTERVIEW WITH COUNT KATSURA AND MARQUIS ITO---THE STORY OF A REMARKABLE TOUR

IF I was enthusiastic before my trip to the Far East, I return still more so," said Mr. Wm. B. Millar, Secretary of the International Y. M. C. A., in speaking of his recent journey to the Philippines, China and Japan, in the interests of the Army and Navy branch of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Millar is greatly encouraged at the progress made by the Association work abroad, and this feeling prompted the remark quoted above. "A wonderful work is now in progress in Manila," continued Mr. Millar. "This point is the headquarters for the Y. M. C. A. army work in the islands. There is a splendid field for missionary labor among the natives, who are not inclined to think our religion any better than their own, unless the example of the American is good; but they take very kindly to the Y. M. C. A. movement for their advantage and betterment."

Mr. Millar is of the opinion that if religious societies would send as many well-equipped and hustling missionaries as the educational societies have sent teachers, and be willing to spend as much money, these islanders would respond gloriously to Christian influences.

Our American "soldier boys," too, have been greatly benefited by the establishment of the Y. M. C. A. in the Philippines.

The traveler met with many distinguished people in China and Japan. One of these, Mr. Wu, is a native Chinese, and Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., a remarkably intelligent and finely educated man, and an earnest Christian.

"This field," said Mr. Millar, "is a hard one for the Christian worker, and he meets with many discouragements; but upon the whole, the outlook is bright, for when a Chinaman accepts the Christian faith he makes an excellent missionary among his own people."

"What was the most interesting incident of my trip? Well, that is hard to say among so many. Japan, without doubt, is the most charming country, and our visit to the Holy Temple, where the Emperor retires once a year for meditation and prayer, was one of the places in which I was greatly interested. Here the Mikado must keep awake for twenty-four consecutive hours, and if by any chance he should nod, he is awakened by watchful attendants, who never relax their vigilance. What would happen if these faithful ones should doze during the long vigil is not stated."

"An amusing and interesting incident was taking the picture of the sacred plough at the Temple of Agriculture in Peking, China. I think but for the presence of Dr. Davis, of the Methodist Mission, we might have gotten into trouble for thus sacrilegiously possessing ourselves of that picture. The natives who guarded it looked upon the operation with a horror only equalled by their amazement at our daring. With this plough, the Emperor turns the first furrow in the spring, woe betide any planter bold enough to precede this ceremony with any farming operations on his own account; his harvest will not only be a failure, but other direful things, too dreadful to think of, will follow such an act of impious disloyalty to his Majesty, the Emperor."

Mr. Millar was granted interviews with Marquis Ito and Count Katsura, the Prime Minister of Japan. He was treated with the greatest courtesy by both of these high dignitaries. Marquis Ito expressed the keenest interest in the work of the Army and Navy Y. M. C. A., as naturally anything that will be of advantage to their army is looked upon with gratitude, for the Jap is first and foremost a patriot, only regretting, like Nathan Hale, that he has but one life to give to his country.

The genial Secretary gave an interesting account of how the news of victory was received in Tokio, the grand decorations and illuminations in the streets in honor of the event; how processions marched up and down, and crowds turned out with great enthusiasm. Hundreds of school children would line up at the stations to cheer the trainloads of soldiers who were starting for the front.

"The Japanese seem to be born patriots," said Mr. Millar. "It is certainly nothing which they acquire, and nothing could exceed their determination that victory must be theirs, no matter how many lives it might cost."

"Perhaps my most important meeting was with Count Katsura. Talking with the Prime Minister was accomplished under some difficulties, as there were two interpreters, one to whom I spoke, who translated my remarks to the Count, who, in turn, gave his reply to another native, who interpreted it to me. You may be sure I was pretty busy during that interview, first watching the Count, to see how my remarks struck him, then waiting for his reply by way of interpreter number two. After presentation and greetings had been exchanged, the Count said diplomatically:

"Japan as a nation has always appreciated the friendship which America has so constantly manifested in the past, and more especially since the outbreak of hostilities with a neighboring Power, the nation as a whole, from his Majesty the Emperor to the people at large, have been deeply touched by the renewed evidences of the sympathy of the American people with Japan in her struggle."

MR. WU AND MR. WM. B. MILLAR, IN A GARDEN IN SHANGHAI

"Whether my reply was equally diplomatic, was not owing to lack of desire on my part, at least. It must have pleased the Count, however, for he continued:

"When you return, I hope you will inform the people in America whom you meet, that in this contest Japan has the assurance of a clear conscience. We believe that it is now clearly recognized by the world at large that Japan's aim in the Orient is merely to extend, by peaceful means, the benefits of modern civilization. She has no ulterior designs of selfish aggrandizement. She desires only peace and progress. Unfortunately this purpose has run counter to the aggressive designs of Russia, and the earnest and patient effort on the part of Japan to reconcile the policies of the two countries unhappily ended in failure. As the last resort, and against our will, we have been forced to take up arms in self-defence; and now, having appealed to arms, we shall not lay them down until the object of the war has been accomplished."

Again Mr. Millar's reply "seemed to meet approval," and the Prime Minister followed with some observations as to the true spirit and purpose of Japan. His country, while diplomatic negotiations were pending, was in danger of being misunderstood by Western nations. Russia, he said, would spare no effort to foster such a misunderstanding, especially on religious grounds. The Count gladdened the Secretary's heart by saying:

"In the efforts to establish a correct understanding abroad of Japan's true position in such matters we have been greatly assisted by the Christian community here, both Japanese and foreign. Ten years ago, when I was in command of a division during the Japan-China war, I was impressed with the fact that one of the important problems was how the men might be assisted in spending their leisure profitably, and the need of some plan or effort that would help solve this problem. I have heard somewhere before, and have been much interested in your account this morning, of the work done in that direction by your organization in the armies and navies of America and Europe, and of the plans already on foot to begin a similar work among the soldiers of Japan. The result of the experiment about to be made will be watched with deep interest."

THE Y. M. C. A. BUILDING AT MANILA

A draft of this notable interview was subsequently submitted to Count Katsura, and the assurance was received from him, that it met with his entire satisfaction, and he expressed his desire that Mr. Millar give it publicity in America as a message to the American people.

More than three per cent. of the Japanese army officers are Christians. Those resident in Tokio have organized a club which meets not only for social intercourse and mutual spiritual improvement, but the members are deeply interested in the spread of Christianity among the soldiers. The work of the Y. M. C. A. has taken a tremendous hold upon the "little brown men."

In recognition of the Association's services, President Roosevelt, Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, says, "Every encouragement should be given to our soldiers and sailors, to live up to the high ideal of their calling, and I take genuine pleasure in extending to those who have so generously interested themselves in this noble effort, my hearty congratulations and my best wishes for the continued success of the great work."

Our readers are already more or less familiar with the work done by the Army and Navy Branch, in the various places where our soldiers are stationed, and where the sailors, when on land, are offered good clean amusements, and are assisted in various ways to shun the pitfalls plentiful in all cities when Jack comes ashore with his pay burning holes in his pocket. The number of letters written by the "Jackies" in the various writing rooms of the Association's buildings, indicate that many hearts are being gladdened with news from the boy in the navy.

PORT ARTHUR'S DESPERATION

WHAT life in besieged Port Arthur means (says a writer in the London Sphere) may be judged from the stories told in the last letters smuggled out of the fortress by Chinese junks. A letter from Major Zelenowsky, quoted in the Siberian papers, says: "The terrors of the siege are not quite so much physical as mental. You get used to the falling shells, the midnight explosions, the perpetually repeated: 'Dmitri's killed' or 'Ivan's killed,' and the knowledge that you yourself will soon be killed too. But you never get used to the terrible mental oppression which reigns in the town. Everyone goes about with a scared white face, with the unasked question trembling on his lips, 'Is there any chance?' And you in turn answer him by your looks, but without words.

"Death here takes half-a-dozen forms. You may be shot or bayoneted in the trenches; you may die of disease; you may blow your brains out through mere tedium, as did poor Gesperi; you may drop dead on the ground and have a verdict of 'died of mental strain,' as has already happened to two artillery officers; you may spend your nights fighting without sleep, and then fall asleep and not awake. This happened to several men in our battalion."

A letter received in Moscow from an infantryman named Lubavin gives a grimmer picture: "This fortress will never be taken, for if it were we are all as good as dead; the Japanese will spare no one. They spare no one in the trenches, and we in turn slay without mercy. Our men begin to look like brutes, but I have never dreamed of anything more fiendish than the expression of the enemy as they are driven back from our earthworks. They look like devils out of hell, and we all expect to be roasted alive if Port Arthur falls. For that reason it won't fall."

The News of the Manchurian Army publishes a letter from Lieutenant Kiasnitsky describing the Japanese attack on August 22: "The Japanese had no chance from the beginning. They poured up the steep slopes of Panlung in thick masses without making any proper preparations, and were simply swept off the face of the earth. On our left after they retired, three living men were left among the barbed wires, and these kept shouting war cries while they were picked off by one of our soldiers to the music of loud laughter. . . . The ravine below streamed with blood, and in one place corpses lay so thick that a dam was formed. The men in our advanced trenches were driven out or bayoneted, but before the Japanese had got a yard further they were all shot down. . . . The night attack and the ensuing sortie were ghastly affairs, and the men's boasts when they returned still more ghastly. One man showed a bayonet bent into two, and affirmed that he had stabbed a Japanese with it, bent it into a hook against an earthwork, and retired dragging the Japanese body a hundred yards over the ground."

"I am sending this by a Chinese junk, which on Thursday got in here filled with rice," writes Sergeant Poliakov. "It may be my last, for every man in our company was killed or wounded yesterday. Last night the Japanese surprised our advanced trench and captured two machine guns, but as they were clearing off they were caught by the electric flashlight and cut to pieces by fire from the Ehrhlig fort. Not a single man escaped. . . . The most bloody fighting had taken place in the trench. Our men refused to yield, and were all butchered, the Japanese stabbing the wounded bodies again and again. . . . Many of the enemy fell into wolf pits and were impaled on stakes, and next morning our men grinned down at them, crying, 'Ah, Master Jap-Fox, are you happy down there?' . . . We have got to a stage at which we all laugh at blood and murder, and no man would shed a tear over the death of his own father."

In the first week of December the Japanese succeeded in capturing several more forts, including one known as 203-Metre Hill, which commands the harbor of Port Arthur. It was reported that this victory cost General Nogi 15,000 men. From 203-Metre Hill, the Japanese guns can sweep the harbor, and either destroy the Russian vessels or drive them outside, to fall a prey to Togo's warships. General Stoessel has fortified Golden Hill and Liaothie Hill, and has no thought of surrender. As soon as the Japanese heavy cannon are mounted on the newly-occupied eminence, the situation may change very materially. In any event, Port Arthur's struggle cannot last much longer.

The Russian Baltic fleet is slowly making its way eastward. A Japanese naval squadron is said to have been despatched from Sasebo to intercept and give it battle.

THIS IS A REAL HOME CHURCH

HOW PASTOR FOX IS REDEEMING AN EAST-SIDE PARISH IN NEW YORK

IT is now more than twelve years since the Rev. Ernest L. Fox introduced the "settlement" idea and methods, to the people of his district, on the East Side of New York. There was at this time but a remnant of a church worshipping in the little old building in East Eleventh Street. In beginning his work of upbuilding, Mr. Fox, carried on evangelistic services in the form of open-air meetings followed by a Gospel service inside the church. Faithfully he worked with his little band of helpers, but after months of most exhausting efforts, the few who were induced to come to the inside meetings could not be held to steady attendance, and the converts needed an unusual amount of training and seemed helpless to change the conditions about them.

People of twenty-five nationalities lived in this crowded district, in poor, unhealthy homes, and there must be found some way to reach them. The pastor made up his mind that through Gospel meetings alone this section of the city could never be redeemed. As he and his helpers lived in the church building, they became real neighbors to the people whose condition appealed so strongly to them. So by many little acts of disinterested kindness the work began. The distribution of flowers, excursion tickets, and neighborly visits to the homes, proved the small end of the entering wedge to the hearts of these neglected people.

It was the idea of helping them in their homes, which induced Mr. Fox to call the church the "People's Home Church." He began the formation of clubs, classes, and boys' brigades. Then something encouraging happened, and it was an epoch-making day when the New York City Church Extension Society bought the tenement house adjoining the church and fitted both buildings for settlement work. As a result of this extension, the work went on most encouragingly and the tenement residents were gathered in in great numbers. Here the young people found a gymnasium and bath, a library and reading-room, kindergarten circles for the little ones, and a day nursery for the babies, while different clubs and classes appealed to the older members of the families.

The Federation of Churches and Christian organizations in New York, to which the Peoples' Home Church belongs, is doing much to redeem the city through co-operative effort. Definite localities are assigned to each church, which is to engage in those lines of work looking toward the bettering of individuals and families and the uplift of social life in the community. Four blocks have been assigned to the Peoples' Home Church, and the locality is such that unusual difficulties are encountered. There are usually from sixteen to thirty families in each tenement, crowded into small apartments. Mr. Jacob A. Riis tells of a room which contained five families, one in each corner, and one in the middle, who lived amicably until one family took in boarders. This was a fact, although it seems incredible to one unacquainted with tenement-house conditions in some parts of New York. Pastor Fox tells of one of his parishioners who said she had to put her head out of the window when she wanted to meditate or pray. Under such conditions one might naturally infer that the spread of the

WASH-DAY IN THE TENEMENTS

THE PASTOR AND MRS. FOX

Gospel would be slow; but while there is much to discourage, or even to appal a less stout heart than that of Pastor Fox, there is also much cause for rejoicing in the results of good, conscientious work. While evils without number are to be fought—low vitality, resultant sickness, loss of work, and pauperism, and last, but by no means least, the saloon evil—they can all be fought and vanquished by the weapons God puts in the hearts and hands of such hopeful, optimistic workers as those who have wrought so much good in this particular parish.

When the Kindergartener takes the little ones into her charmed circle, a beginning is made for a better and healthier life. It is no hard task for the teacher, as she enters the home as a friend of the little ones, to make friends with the mother, and thus a beginning is made towards a better home life—"A little child shall lead them," and the step to the church is soon made. When the Kindergarten is supplemented with the day nursery, the blessing is double-fold. The gymnasium, too, proves a great feeder for the Bible School, as when the bodies of the children are developed with healthy exercise, devoid of the contamination found in the streets, their minds reach out and become more receptive of good teaching. Through the Home Maker's Club, the home life is bettered by the mothers, and the Men's Club, where a "free forum" is maintained, also becomes a helpful factor. Then there are classes for sewing, cooking, sloyd, carpentry, clay modeling and basketry. English is also taught to the Italians. Entertainments are frequently given in the auditorium, which are always well attended. Church and Charity visits are by no means neglected in this busy Settlement, and anyone in the neighborhood seems to feel at perfect liberty to call for help of all kinds from the pastor and his staff. In one day, Mr. Fox was called upon to get some legal advice, to attend to the case of an epileptic orphan, to aid a neighbor in getting a place in the new city baths, to get naturalization papers for a Greek, get bail for a boy who had been arrested, keep a widow with eight children from being evicted and set on the sidewalk, and to restrain a crowd of boys from setting upon the Jewish landlord who was going to put her out—a pretty full schedule even for a busy man.

The Bible School is supplemented with midweek classes for the most elementary religious training, and at stated times all work which interferes, is suspended, and a week of special Gospel services is held, with good results.

Speaking of the change which has come over the neighborhood, Mr. Fox says, "They have come to regard us with favor. We have taken off the wire screens which once covered our windows. Some have availed themselves of the home idea to such an extent that they come in regularly to our family prayers at 6:30 P.M., while others spend their leisure time at the Settlement, which is becoming increasingly a centre of neighborly help and guidance. Both our Bible School and church membership have more than trebled. We have not spiritually redeemed the parish, but we have hitched our wagon to that idea, as our star, and, thank God, we are traveling in the right direction."

The Word for the XXth-Century

A SERMON BY REV. JAMES I. VANCE, D.D.*

WHAT is the word for the twentieth century? "All ye are brethren." It is a word from the first century. Is it out of date? Two thousand years is a long time for a sermon to last; yet people have been talking about Christ's sermon that long. What Jesus said in the street of an Oriental city that dim day of long ago has made a stir in the world.

Imagine the scene. Hostile currents of factional strife, bubble, and fret, and froth at his feet. The Sadducees were there. The Sadducees were good haters. The Pharisees were there, bigoted and exclusive, and whose creed was to hate the Sadducees. The common people were there, suspicious of the upper classes; and the privileged classes were there, looking with contempt on the peasantry. Amid all stood the Man of Peace, the Apostle of Fraternity, the God of Brotherhood, the Saviour of estranged humanity, saying to these rabid, intolerant factions: "All ye are brethren."

No wonder they thought him dangerous. He was. He was the enemy of the old order, the order that stood for division. No wonder they were afraid of him and treated him as a revolutionist. There was no more startling and revolutionary doctrine for the times that heard it than this preached by Christ. The Jews called outsiders "Gentiles." It was a term of reproach. They pronounced "foreigner" with a sneer. God's elect were a close corporation; but here comes this radical iconoclast, boldly assailing the very foundations of society and openly proclaiming the rank heresy that all men are brethren.

An Imperial Message

They crucified Christ, but they could not crucify his message. How it has soared and shone; how it has commanded and became imperial. How its influence has hovered like a benediction over the camp of strife, stilling tumults, blending antagonisms, and leading enemies to love one another. "All ye are brethren." It is sweeter than angel's song. Musical with the melodies of heaven, it has sung itself into the heart and hope of the race. That word of the first century stirs the twentieth. It is not out of date. It is still worth considering. The standard it lifts is the hope and beacon of the modern world.

What is the word for the twentieth century? War is not. Battleships are building. Every few weeks a new man-of-war is launched, but not always under the most favorable auspices. Even the most strenuous advocates of a larger navy, base their plea on "the moral effect," rather than on a prediction of actual fighting to be done. The third battle of Bull Run has been fought and lost; but the spectacle was merely a holiday outing for our soldier boys, and not a sign that the nation is champing the war bit. Arms are not a symbol of the highest civilization, nor war the road of progress. Whoever preaches that it is, gives the lie to the noblest instincts of the race. A peace congress is more civilized than a war camp. Diplomacy has its advantages over butchery, and fraternity is preferable to barbarism. War is not the word for the twentieth century.

Competition is not. The theory that competition is the life of trade, is an exploded heresy. It is very often the death of trade, and the extermination of the tradesman. It is saner to make it to the interest of your business rival to go with you, than against you. It is a wiser procedure to make it to his advantage to maintain the market, rather than break it. The shrewd employer makes his employees his friends. He binds them to the business with the bonds of a common interest. Co-operation is a better business proposition than competition. The best brains and the most sagacious commercial enterprises of the day are at work on trade and industrial combinations. Competition is not the word for the twentieth century.

Exclusiveness Doomed

Exclusiveness is not. The trend is toward representative government and democratic institutions. We are not making privileged classes nowadays. That folly has been cured. We are not proceeding on the theory that the many were created for the special advantage and exceptional rights of the few. Caste is unpopular. The only peerage worth seeking is that of character and service. Pre-eminence is not a thing which separates one from his fellows; but rather binds him to them, and makes him their servant. Good-will is better than caste. Exclusiveness is not the word for the twentieth century.

The word for the modern world must be taken from the life of Christ. "All ye are brethren." A man prominent in public life said recently, "Together is the word for the twentieth century." He was merely paraphrasing Christ's declaration, made 1900 years ago, on the streets of Jerusalem. The word for the incoming century is not a word to separate, but to unite; it is not a barrier, but a bond; it is not to keep us apart, but to help us to get together.

This is the teaching of Christianity, and it is remarkable how it confronts us, from whatever direction we make our approach. The unity of the race proclaims it. Christianity teaches that the human race is one family of one origin, of one blood, of one life. Science tried to explode the Mosaic doctrine of the unity of the race, but struck its head against the granite wall of facts, and lost consciousness. The best scholarship today is lined upon the side of racial unity. People may regard the Genesis account of the origin of man as poetical, pictorial, or literal; but they cannot set aside its truth. God has made of one blood all nations that dwell on the earth. It was a way the Creator had of saying, "All ye are brethren."

The Universal Religion

The universality of Christ's mission makes the same announcement. Christ comes to all, for all, and through all. He is no hermit, but the true cosmopolitan Christ. He is not to be monopolized in any way, by any class, for any cause. He is for all ages and classes and causes, a world-Redeemer, whose invitation is "Whosoever will may come," and whose announcement is that all men are brethren.

This is Christ's teaching, not in a solitary declaration, but in well-nigh all that he said and did. It is the summing up in a word of his entire message and mission. He came to reveal to men that God is their Father. Because the conception of God the Father had been lost, the family had been broken up. Christ's way for men to find each other is first to find God their common Father. Because God is our Father, all we are brethren.

It is likewise the teaching of the church. The brotherhood idea is at the very basis of church organization. The church is an ecclesia, an assembly, a coming together. It is not founded on religious caste, it is not a mutual admiration society composed of a few select and congenial spirits of the community. Its effort is not how to keep out, but how to get in. The church is a get-together club. It should practice the open door.

These "dearly beloveds" who scrutinize closely the social and financial credentials of all who apply for church membership, and who are disposed to exclude any who may come from what they are pleased to designate "certain classes," would do well to get converted over again. They do not represent the Saviour of the world. The church is not a tribunal of judgment, but a brotherhood of sympathy and helpfulness. In the very structure of the church, Christ is saying, "All ye are brethren."

Perhaps this is enough to show that any type of Christianity which discredits my text is spurious. A minister said to me, "I should think you would have a hard time proving that all men are brethren." I replied, "I do not try to prove it. Christ said it, and I accept it and proclaim it."

The Trend of the Time

It is becoming increasingly the doctrine of modern life. What are they saying in the commercial world? They are saying, "We must get together," and they are doing it. Trusts are just a way of trying to get together. When people try to get together, they are not always cured of selfishness, and so a trust may turn out to be a way of staying apart. It may be an iron hand to monopolize trade. Then a trust becomes a curse. Instead of being called a trust, it should be called a distrust. But the movement in the business world is toward unification. Self-interest demands it. Trade is saying, "Together is the word for the twentieth century."

What are they saying in the industrial world? They are saying, "We must get together." Labor unions are just a way of trying to get together. When people try to get together, whether in the ranks of capital or labor, they are not always cured of selfishness, and so a union may turn out to be a way of staying apart. It may be an iron hand to strike capital. Then a union becomes a curse. Instead of calling it a union, it should be called a disunion. But the movements in the industrial world are toward co-operation. Organized labor has come to stay. Let it be careful, however, to keep out caste, and see to it that unionism does not stand for a new method of creating a privileged class. It must protect labor, rather than certain laborers. Then all who labor are brothers. There is a wider sense in which capital and labor are saying to each other, "We must get together." After all, their cause is one, and what affects either is of mutual concern.

The Voice of the Hague

What are they saying in circles of government? They are saying, "We must get together." We must have another Peace Congress. The war in the East is too horrible to be repeated. The diplomacy of civilized nations should make impossible the recurrence of such colossal butchery. And so amid the carnage of battle and the awful massacres of the world's worst war, the President of the United States of America is calling an International Peace Congress. Let us hail it with acclaim, and rejoice that we can say as a nation to the nations of the world: "All ye are brethren;" and proclaim to all peoples the triumphant message of the Prince of Peace.

What are they saying in invention and discovery, in exploration and adventure? They are saying, "We must get together." The facilities for travel and the methods of communication have made the race one people. A man now has his daily paper published on shipboard in mid-ocean. Wireless telegraphy has conquered the ocean barriers. Space has been annihilated, distance wiped out, and the ends of the earth brought together.

What are they saying in philanthropy? They are saying, "We must get together." The privileged life and the deprived life must touch in the brotherhood of the common life. The democracy of our political life must be applied to the conditions of our social life. What are they saying in the circles of the churches? They are saying, "We must get together." Divisions are hurtful. Competition is costly. Rivalry is un-Christian. Wherever possible, denominational lines should disappear, and the unity of the spirit find expression in the union of the followers of Christ. Thus all along the line Christ's message runs, and leaps, and electrifies.

Christ Pervading Life

Thank God it is so! We are learning to love one another, to feel for each other, to be more charitable, to practice more sincerely the Golden Rule. The world is growing better. It is getting together. There is not complete fraternity, to be sure. Hate still stirs up strife, but the spirit of the Christ is in the world, and the era of reconciliation draws nearer.

It's coming yet for a' that,
That man to man the worl' o'er Shall brethren be and a' that.

* Preached in the North Reformed Church, at Newark, N. J. Text: Matt. 23: 8, "All ye are brethren."

Pastor Wagner at the Bowery Mission

THE great majority of our men who heard Charles Wagner the other night, had been seated in the hall for over five hours, waiting for him, as, owing to his numerous engagements, we were unable to announce the exact hour at which he would speak. He had expressed a desire to see our famous "Bread Line," which begins to form a little after midnight, waiting for the opening of the doors at one o'clock, A.M., we, therefore, announced a meeting which would begin at 12 o'clock. Subsequently it was found that he would arrive earlier in the evening, but too late to speak at our ordinary night meeting. Thus it came to pass that on Monday evening, November 28, we held our longest evening meeting on record.

But the men were very patient. A few of the worn-out ones fell asleep, and for once we did not disturb them. The night was a bitterly cold one, so that we could only open the doors and windows for ventilating purposes at short intervals, and, in consequence, the atmosphere was conducive to sleep; but the majority kept bravely awake. The time was pleasantly spent in singing our stirring hymns to the accompaniment of both organ and piano, in testimonies, and in occasional exhortations thrown in by the Superintendent and the regular leader of the evening, Mr. Simon Trenwith, our financial secretary.

At about 11.30, when the hall was so full that scarcely another man could be squeezed through the doorway, and the bread line had already begun to form, there rolled up a carriage, and from it emerged Dr. Klopsch, energetic and happy looking, quickly followed by Pastor Wagner, Dr. Koenig, and M. DeBrunoff.

It is needless to say that our Bowery crowd scanned most eagerly the face of the famous Paris pastor, when once he had become seated on the platform. A few moments more, and the great audience was on its feet, singing as lustily as though it were just beginning its Sunday morning service the hymn that has become so popular with them, "Keep Step with the Master." Then, after a few words of introduction from the Superintendent, the author of The Simple Life stood with compressed lips, grasping the brass rail in front of him, face to face with what he afterwards described as the most remarkable audience he had ever addressed. A tear glistened in his eye as he began, and his deep, rich voice trembled with unwonted emotion. He had been eagerly scanning the faces of the men, and now that the time had come for him to speak to them, it seemed as though any language, much less one that he had only mastered within recent months, would utterly fail to convey the wealth of profound sympathy that had suddenly surged into his heart for these suffering brethren of his. But the words came at last, and wonderful words they were. There was no cant, no insincerity, no patronage in this man, who could say, as, surely, they had never heard any one else say so strikingly before, "I give my love to you. I greet you my brethren—I sympathize with you. I am of the people; I always will be of the people, as I always will be a boy. Tell me what it is that makes you look so sad?" There was something in this that reminded these poor battered and beaten men, of what they had heard so many times of One, who, nineteen hundred years ago, was so gladly heard of the common people.

Charles Wagner did not need to be told that these men had sinned. The marks of the beast were upon them. The badges of servitude to the evil one were prominent on every hand. But the one great fact that seemed to burn itself into his very innermost consciousness was that they were suffering, they were down, they were away from home. Call them back! Tell them that God loves them!

Oh, how pathetic were the words, "I am here as your friend. Would that I could press the hand of each one of you. Would that I could press the heart. We need each other—you and I. We have to love each other."

When Pastor Wagner finished, the audience broke into song again:

Wonderful words, Beautiful words,
Beautiful words of Life, and as this appropriate chorus still lingered in the ears of all, Dr. Klopsch rose, and in appropriate terms thanked the great simple-minded, loving-hearted teacher for the message he had brought.

Then came the first instalment of the breakfast, for it was now close on one o'clock. No sooner did the mission workers commence distributing the rolls and coffee than Mr. Wagner made his way down into the midst of the motley crowd. Eager hands were stretched out to him, which he just as eagerly gripped in his big, strong, kindly grasp.

"Any of you men who are Frenchmen, or of French extraction, kindly raise your hands," said the Superintendent. About twenty hands went up. With a beaming smile the Paris pastor shouted out a greeting in French, and off he started as though he would like to shake hands with them all at once.

"Now you who are Germans raise your hands," and, as promptly as before, and with equal heartiness, came a greeting from Mr. Wagner in the home tongue of the Teuton, to the many who had responded to the appeal.

Mr. Wagner was about to don his overcoat and hat for the purpose of visiting the "Bread Line" outside, when a message was conveyed to him through Mrs. Bird, that there were several disappointed Frenchmen in one corner of the hall that he had not visited. In a moment he was among them again. To his great surprise he found that one in this group had formerly been a school teacher and a neighbor of his in his beloved Alsace.

THE CROWD IN THE MISSION HALL LISTENING TO PASTOR WAGNER

Guided by Dr. Klopsch, Mr. Wagner and his friends then proceeded through the Mission kitchen to the basement hall, where, by the time they arrived, the great throng of shivering, hungry men were streaming in in one unbroken line. There was little opportunity here for personal intercourse with the men, for it is always a scene of bustling activity, so, after a brief survey of the pathetic scene, Pastor Wagner, greatly moved, ascended to the upper hall again, saying, as he did so, "A strange sight! A strange night! A strange city!"

J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent.

Pastor Wagner's Address

Pastor Wagner, in the early hours of the evening on which he visited the Bowery Mission, had been the honored guest of the rich and fashionable. He had been entertained at dinner at the Union League Club. When he left the brilliantly lighted parlors of the uptown club and was whirled down to the Mission, the sudden transformation from a scene of wealth and luxury to one of almost indescribable misery must have impressed him deeply. His address is given in full below:

"I come to you with rough English, but not with a rough heart. I see some of you when I come in were sleeping, as if tired from a long journey. I came here to see you men. I would like to know how you got here. Whatever caused you to leave your fatherlands? I like more to read the faces of men than anything in the world, even more than I like books. Faces are like books: some are sad faces; some of your faces are dark, some are light. When I look at you, I see a page in every face, and in some faces a whole book. How sad, how sad the stories I read there! Tell me what it is makes the page I read so sad. I would have you tell me your story. Come, my good fellow, tell me how you have come here. Tell me your yesterday, your to-day, and your possible to-morrow. I will say to each one of you, I am like you, one of the people—a man who is your friend. I came from the people, I understand the people, and I understand you boys. As I look at you here, I know that some have come here out from the darkness this cold night, here in the warm room, in the room where the people pray for you. You have come here, and you feel that you are not alone. You came from the dark night—came from a long way; but you have come into more than light—you have come into love. No one shall go away hungry. No man is forgotten here, whether hungry or thirsty. Would I could press the hand and press the heart of each one of you. We need each other, and we have to love each other.

"I sympathize with you. You come here out of the rough winter, the bitter darkness of night, my brothers, and I welcome you. I have addressed many meetings in America, but I have attended none like this. If I could only know the several ways you have all come to reach here, your life journeys ending here to-night, I would be the best-informed man in the world, because to know would be a revelation.

"There is nothing more interesting to me than the poor, homeless man—the man without a bed interests me far more than the man with two beds. The man who has no bed, is in his way the richer, because he knows of the world. It is ever the same old sad story, the story of the lost sheep, of the poor bird, which has fallen far from its Father's nest. The stray sheep is ever the most interesting of the flock—the best beloved.

"I am glad you have come here to this place, here where you are told of the good in men's souls by people who bring you love, and the glorious message of Him who came into this sad world to tell us of the Father.

"The poorest among you is worth more than the entire universe. I am going home to Paris, and I will tell them all I have seen in America, but what I have seen to-night I shall never forget. I greet you, my brothers. I share with you in the spirit, even as I breathe with you the air of this room. If I could, I would break the Bread of Life with all of you. I hope I shall never forget this hour. Never more did I feel the calling of the Man who brought the Gospel to the world.

"I am of the people, as I said, and I will always be a boy. Let me tell you a story: When I was a boy about fourteen years old, I was living in Alsace, and, till then, had always been in a lovely little country town. Suddenly, one day, they said to me, 'Now the time is come for you to go to Paris, to the schools.' They put me on the train, and then they said: 'To-morrow, in the early morning, when they call out Paris, you will go out of the train.' Like a boy, I went to see the world, as many of you, my brothers, have gone to see the world. When I started, I was full of hope, and expected to see many wonderful things I had read of in the beautiful books. I expected to see green lawns, more beautiful than any in my little village. When I came to Paris and saw that famous city, I was astonished! It seemed to me it was always night in Paris. Studying in my room, I got homesick. I tried to study, but my heart was not with the book; it was in the little town of Alsace. Suddenly I heard a lark singing in a cage. Such birds are found here in America, and I wonder whether any of you have heard the lark sing—the lark, with its beautiful, and powerful voice. Closing my eyes, I felt that I was again in Alsace, and I heard the lark singing in the trees of my beautiful, native town. The singing of the lark is a delightful sound to the peasant, as he stands in the fields behind the plough. It cheers him, and seems to lift him above the earth. Now, right here, if you listen, you may hear the song of the lark, when you are in sorrow, in grief, in distress, and you can find courage. Here you can hark to the song which will open to you the door of a new land; a song which will make the poor rich, and which will lead the pilgrim to the fatherland—the song of Him who sang 'Come unto Me and I will give you peace.' I wish I could be the lark for you; I wish I could sing for you, and lead you to a better—a higher life. God is speaking to you. In my voice may you hear his."

Pastor Wagner's Message

PASTOR WAGNER has come and gone. During his brief stay with us he touched the two extremes of American life. He mounted the gilded heights of society; he was the guest of millionaires, statesmen, and philanthropists; he enjoyed the exalted privilege of explaining to the President and the leading men of the nation, the philosophy of the "Simple Life." And he sat down with the lowly, and gave words of cordial cheer and encouragement to the despised and the outcast.

On one of the last nights of his sojourn he was the honored guest of the richest club in America. From its table, glittering with silver, and groaning under its luxuries, and from the charming eloquence of a company of distinguished entertainers, he turned away at midnight to plunge into the lowest social deep on this continent—the Bowery Mission.

What a sudden transformation was this, from the brilliantly-lighted banquet hall, to a place which the world of wealth and fashion would shudder to enter. Hundreds of the sons of hopeless poverty and misfortune sat patiently waiting to greet him, and to hear his message. Was it astonishing that, when the Mission Pastor of Paris confronted that eager, haggard crowd, and saw the "Bread Line" in grim formation, he should have cried out in wonder and dismay: "A strange sight! A strange city!" With all their poverty and suffering, neither London nor Paris ever beheld anything more terrible in its realism than this spectacle of the Bowery "Bread Line" on a winter midnight.

Could the message that was brought by this latter-day Apostle of Christian simplicity to those hungry outcasts, be the same that he gave to the full-fed rich, whom he left but an hour before? The same—yet not all the same. Words of consolation, that fell like sweet balm on the broken hearts of the poor, might sound very different to the ears of the rich. We know there are some who have derided the "Simple Life" philosophy as a "fad," and have predicted its early demise; and there are others who reject it as pure idealism, and hence unattainable. But to the heart that will open to receive it, the teaching is full of Christ's own blessed Gospel. Its best test is its direct appeal to the humble; to many of the rich it is, as was the Gospel to the Greeks in Paul's day—foolishness.

We hear that it has been proposed in certain quarters to build a great temple for Pastor Wagner in Paris, in some central and no doubt fashionable section. Far better let him build his Church "down among the people," as he originally intended. Anything that might happen to take him out of his true orbit as a spiritual teacher to the masses would be a misfortune. His highest mission is to the workers, the plain people, the simple souls, who have the fewest privileges, and who stand most in need of spiritual help and consolation. Such a message as he delivered, in utterances broken by strong emotion, to the men of the Bowery on that memorable night, was worth more than a hundred sermons from a fashionable pulpit.

Personal Confession

MANY are ready to join in general confessions that do not mean anything nor commit them to any obligation to live a new life. "We have all erred and strayed from the way." "We have done the things we ought not to have done, and have left undone the things we ought to have done, and there is no health in us." "Human nature is weak." "To err is human," etc., etc. All these pious commonplaces may be very well as general statements in a public service; but, to make good character, the confession which we make to our Heavenly Father must become more personal and definite than that. The most humble reference to the general imperfections of human life, and the faultiness of the world at large, will never take the place of the frank admission, "I have sinned." And there must be no evasion, no looking around for some convenient place to lay the blame. Who can tell how the story of the Garden of Eden would have ended if, instead of excusing himself by blaming others, Adam had fallen in penitence before the Almighty, crying: "I have sinned, O God!"

The only honest, healthy, manly basis for the beginning of right life is frank and unreserved confession of our faults before God.

Christ the Keystone

THERE is an old tradition, cherished in certain quarters, that the temple builders in the absence of Hiram Abif, the architect, threw away the keystone which he had designed and cut. They threw it away because of its peculiar shape; it was neither oblong nor square; nor would it fit anywhere in the wall. Finally its need was felt, its proper place was found, and it was raised to the top of the arch.

So Christ as the Divine Lord and Saviour, may be rejected, but he will be exalted at last. Every rejection but adds lustre to his glory. He is ever found again and put back in his own place at the top of the arch. He has no other place; he fits nowhere else. He is not one fine square stone along with others—Confucius, Buddha, Mahomet. He is the center of history. Previous history comes up to him on one side and subsequent history on the other, like two sides of the arch. He locks the arch. Without him the arch of history falls to confusion. In his place as the keystone he is the solution of all problems. Put him anywhere else, and not only is all history, but Christ himself, is forever an unsolved problem.

When Will Wars Cease?

RAPID and surprising is the development of the Peace movement. Even the most ordinary observer must be impressed with the importance of the events now in conjunction. Russia and Japan both heartily sick of the war and manœuvring diplomatically for its honorable termination; the leading European Powers assenting to the proposed reconvention of the Hague International Court; our own Government with some seven arbitration treaties with foreign Powers, some concluded, others in process of favorable negotiation; the whole Western Hemisphere, from Baffin Bay to Cape Horn, at peace—such are the general conditions that appear on the surface.

But the real story of the progress of peace does not lie open to the superficial gaze. It must be sought in the hearts of the millions of Europe and our own land, who are weary of war and its cruel, useless sacrifice of human life, and who chafe under the heavy burdens it imposes upon industry. They have come rightly to the conclusion that war is the world's worst sin, and that it can only be conquered by the resolute and united opposition of those who are most vitally affected, since they are the greatest sufferers: the "common people." Not to the kings and the nobilities, to whom the masses are but as pawns in a game of chess, nor the military leaders whose trade is war, nor those traders and speculators to whom the defeat of armies or the rise or fall of a nation's credit are like phases in the stock market, does war bring the heaviest woe and suffering, but to the industrious multitudes, who are not only compelled to do the fighting, but to bear the brunt of the cost. To them, the cessation of wars would mean the ushering in of a section of the millennium. Their education during the last twenty years has taught them something of their true position and their undeveloped power. They have been led not only to pray for peace and to hope for it, but to work for it with a resolute purpose that must sooner or later make it come to pass. With the world's productive classes once firmly united against all wars of conquest and aggression, the "great game of kings" would soon cease to be a factor in human affairs.

In the countries of Europe, as well as in our own land, this peace propaganda is spreading. There are indications that, within a few years, it will attain a marvelous growth. In lands of more advanced intelligence, the "peace test" will be applied to public men in every grade of official service. Every town, village and hamlet will have its Peace Circle. Churches will fall into line with the new movement, and a great Peace wave will rise throughout Christendom which will sweep away all obstructionists.

Okakura-Kakuzo, an eminent Japanese scholar and traveler, who has been greatly honored by the Mikado for his learning and his labors in the interest of national education, has lately written a book, in which he voices the absorbing problem that is agitating Japan to-day. "When will wars cease?" he asks. "In the West . . . aggressive nations have no conscience, and all chivalry is forgotten in the persecution of weaker races. He who has not the courage to defend himself, is bound to be enslaved. What mean those strange combinations which Europe displays—the hospitals and the torpedo, the Christian missionary and imperialism, the maintenance of vast armaments as a guarantee of peace? . . . Europe has taught us war; when shall she learn the blessings of peace?"

This rebuke by the distinguished Oriental scholar applies to all the Western nations alike. Selfish, indefensible aggression is at the root of almost all wars. Let us thank God, at this Christmas season, that the Gospel of human brotherhood, taught by Jesus Christ, is accomplishing its work, and that the horizon is even now aglow with the dawn of a brighter day of world-wide good-will.

BRITISH TRIBUTE TO WASHINGTON

DURING the recent visit to this country of the band of the British Grenadiers, the crack regiment of which King Edward is Honorary Colonel, a formal welcome was tendered them at Philadelphia. While they were in the city, there was a scene that deserves to live in history, in view of the strange changes that time has brought in the relations of the two nations. In the square outside Independence Hall, the very centre of the movement which separated this country from British control, this famous military organization lined up in all the glory of their military equipment. There, under the shadow of the statue of George Washington, they gave a grand concert, in which the British national airs, and those of this country, were rendered with thrilling effect. An audience of invited guests listened entranced to the brilliant execution of the celebrated band, and heartily applauded the performance. It is not the first time that such music by a military band has been heard in the same historic place. There are men still living whose grandfathers have told them of the thrilling times when the old walls echoed those strains. But then this regiment was accounted an abhorred enemy, and its presence would have been regarded as an outrage. But now the old enmity has been buried, and the friendly visit of the representatives of the historic enemy's army was cordially welcomed, and the visitors were cordially honored by the descendants of the men who had been prominent in the old-time conflict. If the valiant hero whose statue adorns the square could have witnessed the scene, how rejoiced his heart would have been at these proofs of peace and amity.

The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim (Isa. 11: 13).

A Hawaiian's Self-Sacrifice

A visitor to Hawaii recently paid a visit to the Leper Home on Molokai Island. There he heard a pathetic story, and the heroine of it was pointed out to him. She was a girl of wonderful beauty, and as yet shows no traces of the disease. One day she presented herself to the health board, and, showing a white patch on her shoulder, asked to be sent to Molokai. The doctors examined her, and though the white patch had all the appearance of leprosy, there was an absence of other symptoms which puzzled them. They questioned the girl, who ultimately broke down and confessed that she was trying to deceive them. She said that she had been married a few months previously to a man whom she loved dearly. He had since made the discovery that he was a leper. He had written her a letter of farewell and had gone to the island. She had pleaded to be allowed to see him, but had been refused. She could not bear to be separated from him, and had appealed to a native doctor who had given her a liniment, which produced the white patch resembling leprosy. She begged to go to the island to wait on her husband, and declared that if she was refused she would get the infection and become a leper, in order to be eligible. The doctors, believing that she would keep her threat, or would go crazy if they refused, allowed her to go to the island, warning her that she could never return. She gladly gave the required pledge, and went cheerfully to the leper settlement. How her husband must appreciate the love that could make such a sacrifice for him. It would be the basest ingratitude on his part, if he treated her as some men treat Christ, who for love of us voluntarily came to earth and lived and died the sinless among sinners to save them.

Him who knew no sin, he made to be sin on our behalf that we might become the righteousness of God in him. (II. Cor. 5:21).

Sunk By His Gold

During the recent voyage of the Hamburg-American Liner Bluecher to this country, there was a distressing case of suicide. A Dane, who was a passenger, was returning from a visit to his native land. He was sixty-three years of age, and had been here for many years. He was much depressed in spirits, and he told some of the passengers that his journey had been disappointing. His old friends were all dead or scattered, and there had been no one in his native town whom he knew or knew him. There were other reasons for his depression that he only vaguely hinted at. As the steamer approached this side, he grew more and more gloomy. One day he was noticed standing near the rail, and the Captain watched him. After a few moments, he mounted the rail and plunged into the ocean. The Captain threw a life belt to the spot where he fell and ordered the vessel stopped, that search might be made for him. It was unavailing, for he never rose to the surface. A passenger, with whom he talked, said that his sudden disappearance was caused by the weight of a belt he wore, in which he carried a quantity of gold. But for that he might have been saved. Of how many who have lost their souls might a like thing be said. They might have been saved if it had not been for their money.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction (I. Timothy 6: 9).

Setting Up a Pillar

Two of the pillars which surround the choir of the great Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York, were set in place last week. There are eight of the pillars, and two sections to each. The lower sections are six feet in diameter and thirty-six feet in length. They weigh ninety tons. The upper sections are eighteen by six feet and weigh forty tons. These are the last of the pillars, and there was a company of interested spectators to witness the ceremony of putting them in place. The official part of the task was performed by Dr. W. R. Huntington, rector of Grace Church, and

Rev. John P. Peters, the rector of St. Michael's, who are trustees of the Cathedral. When all was ready the superintendent of the works gave the word to start the engines, and the ninety-ton pillar was raised from the ground and swung slowly into place. There was not a hitch in the work, and within three and a-half minutes from the start the great stone hung suspended over the pier which was to support it, ready to be lowered as soon as the ceremony of laying the mortar had taken place. That duty was deftly done by the two clergymen and the stone was lowered into position. It is thus that men erect their temples, but the great building which God is preparing is made of living stones, prepared and placed by his own hand.

Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out (Rev. 3: 12).

A Radium Clock

Another use has been found for radium, in the production of a clock that will go without being wound up for two thousand years. At a recent meeting of scientists, one of these clocks, of which radium is the motive power, was exhibited. In this clock a small piece of gold-leaf is electrified by means of a very small quantity of radium salt. It bends away from the metal substance and keeps on moving under this influence, until it touches the side of the vessel. At the moment of contact it loses its electrical charge, upon which it springs back and is electrified again. The repetition of this process over and over again is the whole secret, and the inventor considers it might be expected to go on, barring accidents, for a couple of thousand years. Asked if such an instrument could be made a reliable timekeeper, he answered: "Yes, so far as the principle is concerned. You have the energy, and unless the thing stuck at some time or other, it would go on and on, as long as the radium kept its power, which is practically indefinite." He was asked if this did not solve the problem of perpetual motion, but he said it did not, as even radium eventually exhausted itself, though it lasts so long a time. Nothing in this world is perpetual.

They shall perish, but thou remainest: they shall be changed, but thou art the same and thy years shall not fail (Heb. 1: 11, 12).

BRIEF NOTES

The Des Moines News says that a prominent liquor dealer in that city, recently sent a donation to the First United Presbyterian Church. After deliberation, it was returned to him, with the information that the Church was not in harmony with the business by which the money was earned, and, as a result, would have to decline the gift and all others of a similar nature.

Rev. William Parsons, who has been working for many years as a Baptist missionary among the Telugas of India, has been impressed by the miserable condition of the lepers, of whom there are 700,000 in India. He has determined to devote his life to them. He has come to this country in the hope of obtaining funds to go and labor among them. His address is care of Rev. R. E. Williams, Parsons, Lucerne County, Pa.

The International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, in its review of the year, gives these facts: The associations have grown from 1,736 to 1,815; the membership from 350,435 to 373,502. Employed officers have increased 164; buildings increased to 475, adding 38, at a cost of over $2,000,000; the association raised and expended $3,856,328, an increase of $320,322 over last year. There are now 206 Railway Associations, with an aggregate membership of over 70,000.

Good Value for the Money

Very many thanks for the beautiful Calendar I received this morning. I thought last year's was beautiful, but this year's surpasses it. I do not know how you can give such beautiful presents with such a good paper, that is worth a great deal more than the subscription price asked.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

"THE one greatest of all reasons," continued Harvey, "why the world to-day is moving with such swiftness towards Socialism is what you have seen to-night. On the one hand, a condition of physical labor, which, in one way or another, is attended with pain, danger, and excessive duration, at unfair compensation, and on the other hand, a condition of idle luxury on the part of those who profit unjustly by the fruits of physical toil. The 'Row' down by the mills, and Harwood's or Wrightam's house are the visible sign of the injustice. The things we saw in the furnace-rooms, and the things we saw in the ball-room are what make labor unions and socialistic parties. Does any wonder that men like those in the furnace-rooms, who are actually with their hands making the stuff that brings such enormous profit—does any wonder that they cannot be made to see that persons like Harwood and Wrightam are entitled to such an unjust proportion of the profits of the business in which they never engage with any physical pain? They tell us wages are high. But how high are they compared with the increase of dividends in the Lenox mills during the last five years? If wages had been increased in proportion to dividends, the men in the furnace-rooms would be getting five times what they get now. But granting that wages are high, so is everything else that a man has to live on. Everything is in a combine—meat, ice, coal, lumber, steel, oil, the common necessities of life. Harwood is one of the directors of the coal trust. Last winter the coal that average labor in the Lenox mills buys cost $2.50 a ton. This year it has gone up to $2.75, and the Trust says it is necessary on account of the increase of wages paid to the miners. Yet, I noticed the people who control the oil and coal trusts never suffer from increases in wages. They don't have any fewer automobiles or receptions or trips to Europe or summer residences or purple and fine linen. They smile to themselves, and let the people, the dear, deluded people, pay the extra wages. And then to ease their consciences, one or two of them, after putting up coal twenty-five cents a ton or oil two cents a gallon, benevolently contribute an additional amount of the people's money to some college university or missionary society, and get the credit for being great Christian philanthropists. The universities are a good thing, perhaps; but if the truth were told, over the doorway of every new building ought to be inscribed the words, 'This building was erected by the money paid by the common people to meet a rise of two cents per gallon on oil, or twenty-five cents a ton on coal, or seven per cent share on railroad stock,' as the case might be. This might be a good way to build expensive colleges or endow missionary societies and no one would grumble, whereas, now the magnates get the credit and the people pay the freight. Mr. Stanton, there was a time when the average workingman did not know these plain facts. He is beginning to know them now. There was a time when he accepted his little share of living out of the products his toil made possible. To-day he is beginning to ask for more, because he believes it is just that he receive more. The tenement and the palace, the day's wage compared with the luxury, the sight of the unequal and unjust division of the fruit of labor, is what is leading thousands, yes, millions, into the socialistic movement. And when you tell the mill workers of Lenox to love such men as Harwood and Wrightam, men who have no sense of the Brotherhood, men who have all their lives selfishly lived the hog, whose sons and daughters have no aim in existence except to amuse themselves; when you ask the workingmen of Lenox to love these other men you ask an impossibility. They cannot love them. Ask Harwood and Wrightam to love the operatives in the mills and see what they say to you."

"I'm willing to ask them," said Stanton interrupting. "I should like to be present when you do."

"Will you go with me?"

"Mr. Harwood wouldn't let me into his house. He regards me as a wild beast."

"That is because you have antagonized him with the Union."

"But he does not understand, he nor his kind, that there may be a law of collective ethics higher than a law of individual ethics. Wrightam and his kind say no man has a right to say whom the directors of Lenox mills shall employ. 'It is a free country and every corporation has a right to employ anyone it pleases, and any man has a right to work for whom he pleases, without joining a Union.' That sounds ethically and morally right. But I say there may be such a thing as a collective ethical law that is higher and more binding than this much quoted individual ethics. Here is what my friend Raymond said in his great speech last week before the Teachers Assembly at Manchester:

"Free contract in the individualistic sense has not existed in the industrial world for a generation. Free contract is impossible between the individual laborer and the superintendent of a corporation. The superintendent makes the terms, the laborer accepts or starves. The freedom of the individual laborer resembles that of a cat in a tub on a lake. The cat does not have to stay in the tub, it is free to jump into the lake. All that the laborer has gained for a hundred years has been won by the trade-unions. That workmen in many trades now enjoy a fair wage and more reasonable hours of service, is due to the struggle and suffering of countless men, women, and children, loyal to the principle of Unionism. Shall we now permit men who refuse the social obligations of their age—industrial freebooters, who would enjoy the fruits won by their fellow-craftsmen without obedience to the protective demands of the Union—to take the bread from the mouths of our wives and children? Shall we let these selfish, social, and industrial traitors disorganize our trade, and render possible at the first breath of an industrial panic, a return to the miserable wage and long hours of a generation ago? Slowly have we won an advance in the standard of wages that makes possible better food, better wages, better clothes and more schooling for us and our families? Shall this personal and communal gain be lost for the sake of maintaining ancient individual rights which the world has outgrown, and the unrestrained exercise of which would pauperize our families and injure the whole commonwealth, including the industrial freebooter himself?*

"But I might as well whistle to the wind to stop it as to try to make Mr. Harwood understand the position of the Union in regard to non-union labor. And I don't suppose you believe in my position either."

"Frankly, Brother Harvey, I do not. And I still believe in my proposition that practically all the trouble between Capital and Labor is caused by an absence of love between man and man. Economically it does not pay to hate any one. The Harwoods and the Wrightams of society are apparently not worth loving. In reality, very few people do love them. Outside of his most immediate relations, I suppose no one is so little loved as the average millionaire. And in many cases their own family relatives are little to be envied if the record of the divorce courts is good evidence of unhappiness. What I don't see, Brother Harvey, is the reason for you and your companions in the trade-unions wishing to get more money, which, so far as history shows, means more misery. You don't suppose for a moment, do you, that either Harwood or Wrightam are happy men?"

"That is not the question. It is a question of right, of justice. The men of the Union say it is unjust that a man who actually works with his body for eight or ten hours a day in a difficult, dangerous position, should receive only three or four dollars a day, while the man who controls the monopoly, but never does any physical labor, gets ten or a hundred times as much. Why should the actual labor, which shortens a man's life in some parts of the mill by one-half—why should that receive for its share of the valuable product the smallest compensation? You say the brain labor necessary to direct the big business is worth more, and is entitled to more and far higher pay. As an economic statement that has always been accepted by the world as a matter beyond dispute. I suppose I should be called a fool for expressing any other view. But I do not believe in that generally accepted statement. I think the men who do the hard, dangerous, life-destroying work, ought to receive at least equal compensation with the men who organize and direct the work with their brains. In other words, I believe economically that the physical labor is worth just as much to the world as the mental labor, that the two go hand in hand, and there ought to be no distinction made between them when it comes to payment for service. A good many men believe just as I do. But the trade-unions don't go that far, generally, of course. But is it any wonder if we make a few mistakes like the other night, when, after seeing a prospect of winning our case with the company, the non-union men come in and kick it all over? The whole history of trade-unions shows that for a hundred years we have been, on the whole, making a manly protest for human rights; as Raymond says, it is true, all that the laborers have gained for a hundred years has been won by the trade-unions. To have our purposes misunderstood, to have men like Harwood or Wrightam, fight us as if we were enemies of society, is maddening; but the most disheartening of all, is the fact that workingmen themselves do not stand with us, but get in the way of their own interests, and make it harder for us to justify our position with the public."

They walked along some way in silence, and Harvey finally said quietly, as he had talked all along, "I didn't mean to say so much." When Stanton reached the door of his house the two men shook hands silently. As Harvey turned to go home he stopped.

"Are you actually going to see Harwood? Give him my love if you do!"

"I'll see him and Wrightam, too."

"You're a braver man than I gave you credit for, Mr. Stanton," Harvey replied, this time without a sneer, as he said good-night again and walked away.

Stanton talked over the evening's experience with his wife. When he spoke of his determination to see the two mill owners, Mildred asked doubtfully, "Do you think it will do any good?"

"I don't know. Wrightam is a member of Dr. Rowen's church. Harwood, as you know, has for years been a member of Saint Cecilia. Why should they not listen to the Gospel of Love?"

"They have not been in the habit of hearing it," said Mildred, and immediately exclaimed, "Pardon me, Fredrick!"

"It is true, dear," Stanton answered sadly. "How much of this Gospel did I preach during my pastorate in Saint Cecilia? I owe Harwood a message now to make amends for my neglect so many years."

"How will he take it?"

"I don't know. Harwood is a remarkable man in many ways."

"God be with you, Fredrick, as you go to him," his wife said softly.

"Amen!" exclaimed Stanton.

He had made his statement about going to see the mill owners, not lightly; but without realizing to the full, all that the interview might mean to himself as well as to the men. Now that he talked it over to his wife, he began to realize with a curious thrill of genuine excitement what might possibly come of it.

John B. Wrightam sat in his "den" the next evening smoking a pipe, as the servant brought in Dr. Stanton's card. The mill owner and trust promoter went out into the hall to meet his caller, and with a show of cordiality invited him into his private room.

"Have a cigar, doctor?" said Wrightam, proffering a boxful.

"Thank you, Mr. Wrightam, I don't smoke."

"You miss a good thing. I'm so dead nervous I have to use a pipe."

He took it up, put it in his mouth, and eyed Stanton through the smoke curiously.

"I came to see you on a matter which concerns the mills, the men especially, Mr. Wrightam."

"Ah!" Wrightam took his pipe out of his mouth, and held it up, looking at the bowl through his heavy, half-closed lids.

"You're specially interested in the men, Dr. Stanton? Believe you were talking to them the night of the riot. Well?"

"Mr. Wrightam, what do you think of these men, not as forces in the economic world, but as human beings? I tried to say to them that night that I believed the one thing they all lacked was love for others. I have not come here to preach to you, but I do feel that the whole trouble between you as a representative of the capitalistic class is caused by an absence of love on both sides. The whole fact of a brotherhood is completely ignored. Mr. Wrightam, as man to man, have you ever tried to love these men as brothers of yours?"

John B. Wrightam took his pipe out of his mouth, and his face turned very red as he stared at Stanton. The silence in the "den" grew oppressive. At last the mill man burst into a short laugh.

"Love them! You don't mean it, Dr. Stanton! Love those men? Well, I take it that's asking a trifle too much of John B. Wrightam! It isn't a proposition I ever entertained."

"But is it asking too much to entertain such a proposition? You are a professed Christian, Mr. Wrightam, and a member of a church. What does your church teach? What does your Christianity require if not just this, that you love these men and seek to do them all the good you can?"

Again John B. Wrightam's face grew red, and he regarded his caller with astonished irritation.

"I don't feel called on, Dr. Stanton, to pour out my affection on a lot of rioting, drinking lawbreakers. Ask me to love a mob like the one we had the other night? Well, I guess not. Love isn't what they need. Whip some sense into them. Arrest about a thousand and put them in jail for thirty days for breaking the laws and inciting the mob spirit. That's what they need! Talk about justice! What right have these men for love from me? They would dictate to us through that rascal Harvey and say what men we shall employ in the mills. But they are losing this strike. The mills are going again. And Harvey and his lawbreakers will learn they can't dictate to the Lenox Mill Company, not while John B. Wrightam is on deck!"

Stanton listened, and his blood boiled. If he had been guided by his wife's quiet spirit, he might not have said what he now did. But his vivid consciousness of the masterful, hypocritical pose of the man, swept all other considerations out of his mind.

He rose to his feet and faced the magnate like one of the old prophets. Wrightam's sullen, heavy face lowered in impotent anger, as he had to listen.

"John Wrightam, who are you to talk about the lawlessness of Labor, you, who have for years been one of the directors of as lawless an organization of Capital, as ever broke the statutes of this State? You know better than I do, how repeatedly you and your associates have used the influence of your great wealth to ignore the laws specially directed against your combine. You know better than any one except God, who will bring you to account if the State fails to do so, how many weak and helpless competitors you have crushed out: how many legislators you have bribed; how much money you have spent to corrupt courts and cover up the record of your company's crime before the law! And do you talk to me about the lawlessness of these workmen, who are guilty, and for whom I am not pleading any excuse, but whose act is not to be compared for one moment in enormity with that of the continued lawlessness of Capital throughout this Republic. Where Labor has broken the laws and ignored the statutes once, Capital has done it ten times; and, shielded by its wealth and influence, it pretends to grow indignant at the actions of Labor. Verily, if the Lord of all the earth were here to-day, He would say to you and your kind: 'Ye hypocrites, first cast out the beam out of your own eye, and then you shall see clearly to cast out the mote out of your brother's eye.' God judge you, John Wrightam, if you do not acknowledge your sin against these men, and against society. He will teach you one of these days how hard it is for rich men to get into the Kingdom of God."

And having said this, Fredrick Stanton walked out of the house, feeling that his errand had been a total failure; but not without a sense of righteous indignation that did not include very much feeling of regret that he had spoken his mind freely to a man, who, in the church which he attended, never heard a word of plain preaching on the subject of lying, bribery, or lawlessness in high places.

He was talking it all over with his wife the next evening. She had expressed her complete confidence in his action, and he had been wondering with her whether it would be a case of pearls before swine to go and see Harwood, when the bell rang, and Stanton went to the door. To his undisguised astonishment, Harwood himself stood on the porch.

Stanton asked him in at once, and noted as he did so the man's pale, troubled face.

"I would like to see you alone, Dr. Stanton, if I may," he said, after he had returned Mrs. Stanton's greeting.

Stanton led the way into his study, and shutting the door motioned the mill owner into an easy chair. Harwood sank into it and put his hands over his face.

Stanton waited silently and eyed his unexpected visitor with interested wonder, for the man was, as he had said to Mildred, very remarkable in many ways.

"My wife left me, Dr. Stanton, yesterday. She is not coming back. The quarrel between us is irreconcilable, I do not think—I do—not—think she ever really loved me. She was attracted by my wealth, as I was attracted by her beauty. We have lived a dog's life. It is a case of incompatibility, you understand. My oldest girl, Leona, will stay with her mother. The boys are in the military school at Poughkeepsie. My youngest daughter will go to France with my sister. This separation will probably get into the papers in time, but no one knows about it now but her and you and myself. Dr. Stanton, you were a faithful pastor to me while you were at Saint Cecilia. You may have thought yourself a coward during that pastorate, but your sermons contained many beautiful and helpful things to me, and your prayers often helped me. I don't know a man of my acquaintance who is of any use to me now. It would be worse than mockery for me to go to a man like Wrightam, for example. He and the others do not know anything but money. My God!" The man got up and walked across the room, then came back and sat down again. "Can you give me any comfort? I am forty-eight years old. That was the birthday party celebrating the event night before last, Dr. Stanton. My sister, who I think loves me a little, got it up. She is ignorant of the hell in which my wife and I have lived for twenty years. But I can't go to her. You are the only man I know who is likely to give me any peace of mind. I felt as if I must go to some one, or I was in danger of suicide. You see my affections were bound up in my wife. To have her leave me—"

He put his hands over his face again, and Stanton eyed him in wonder. Harwood had been the proudest man in Saint Cecilia. Tall, handsome, a university man, with fine literary tastes, unscrupulous to a certain degree in the market-place, kind and affectionate in his family relations, the sight of him sitting there humbled with this deep trouble, touched Stanton profoundly.

What was there to do but go to God with him.

Stanton got down by him, put his hand on his shoulder, and prayed. When the prayer ceased Harwood was sobbing. That nearly broke Stanton down, but he rejoiced over it. He knew Harwood would not think of suicide now.

"Thank you," he said after a while. Then there was a long pause.

"I don't want you to think I'm converted or anything of that sort, Dr. Stanton. I know I've been a church member all these years, but that hasn't meant anything. I know, too, that I've wasted God's opportunity with my money and all that. But this trouble has made me feel the uselessness of money and social power, and all that, to give happiness. Do you know, nothing in all my experience touched me like your action that day when you announced your authorship and stepped out of the bishopric? I was on the point then of getting up in the church and commending your act and siding with you. I've been on the point a dozen times of coming to you since, to have a talk with you over the whole social question. I'm not an aristocrat either by birth or training. But circumstances seemed to force me into the class of Wrightam against my convictions. I found I could make money easy according to modern methods of captaining industry. All the time I have made a study of social questions. My sympathies, so far as my intellectual consent is concerned, are all with Labor. Something I saw of Bishop Potter's recently stirred me to blood heat. It was like this:

"In the country in which you and I live, what we call civilization has undergone what is not less than a gigantic revolution. The huge aggregations of capital which have practically taken from the hands of the individual, the independent disposition of his labor, and have introduced into his existence paralyzing uncertainty as to both his comforts and his future, and gradually widening the breaches that separate classes from classes, and the competitions that, while they cheapen the necessities of life, increase the elements of perplexity and uncertainty as to how great multitudes may obtain them. All these are features of our modern civilization, full of danger."

"That is from a recent address by Bishop Potter, on 'Wealth and Commonwealth,' at New Haven, Conn.," said Stanton, his mind in a state of wonder at Harwood's disclosures.

"If Harvey had said it, the Lenox Times would have called him a dangerous inciter of class hatred," said Harwood. "Well, Dr. Stanton, somehow I feel as if my salvation lay in this social whirlpool somewhere. My home is destroyed. The incentive for the acquisition of money is gone. Something in me must have satisfaction. My social sins have been many. Not vices, but failure to be true to my own convictions, to my deepest understanding of justice. Have you got a copy of Herbert Spencer?" He went over to the book-shelves, and Stanton pointed out the set of Spencer's works. Harwood took down a volume, turned to a passage, and read aloud.

"The system under which we at present live, fosters dishonesty and lying. It prompts adulterations of countless kinds. It is answerable for the cheap imitations which, eventually, in many cases, thrust the genuine article out of the market. It leads to the use of short weights and false measures. It introduces bribery, which vitiates most trading relations, from those of the manufacturer and buyer down to those of the shopkeeper and servant. It encourages deception to such an extent, that an assistant who cannot tell a falsehood with a good face is blamed; and often it gives the conscientious trader, the choice between adopting the malpractices of his competitors, or greatly injuring his creditors by bankruptcy. Moreover, the extensive frauds, common throughout the commercial world, and daily exposed in law courts and newspapers, are largely due to the pressure under which competition places the higher industrial classes; and are otherwise due to that lavish expenditure, which, as implying success in the commercial struggle, brings dishonor. With these minor evils must be joined the major one, that the distribution achieved by the system gives to those who regulate and superintend, a share of the total produce which bears too large a ratio to the share it gives to the actual workers."

"Now it's the last sentence that appeals to me. All my life, so far, I have been conscious of violating my convictions, in the matter of justice to the men who have helped to create the wealth. And the question with me now is, how to get my mind into the right relation with my convictions. I've got to do something or I'll go mad."

Stanton did not know what to say to this. But he did know what to give in the way of spiritual healing. When Harwood went away, he gave Stanton every assurance that he was helped so far as that went, but he was not any nearer a decision as to his own future.

Anna E. H., Nebraska. "I wish to acknowledge that the Lord has heard my prayer. I was sick and I prayed to the Lord and he wonderfully helped me."

J. E. L. W., Illinois. "I take great pleasure in reading the columns of Answered Prayers. I wish to add my own acknowledgment of God's goodness in answering my petitions. I feel my prayers were directly answered."

L. A. E., New York. "He whom I love best on earth has been ill for some time. I have prayed believingly to the Great Physician, and it was 'His Will' to restore my dear one to health and strength. Let us not forget to pray."

A Mother. "I want to add my testimony to the list of Answered Prayers, for the help and encouragement of others. I also want to ask all who have had prayers answered, to join me in earnest prayer for the conversion of a son."

E. O. F., New York. "I have been helped and strengthened through reading Answered Prayers. I prayed for a special blessing, that has been granted, and my heart is filled with joy and gratitude to Him, the Giver of every good and perfect gift."

Mrs. W. H. W., Fair Oaks, Calif. "I was in great trouble and distress. I took my trouble to the Lord, and promised him if he would answer and relieve me, I would acknowledge it before men. He did, and I bless his holy name."

Mrs. L. H. O. "I had a burden to bear, so I asked the Lord to roll it away. He did, and I am so thankful that I want to acknowledge it to the world. I am praying for other things which I know I will receive sometime, somehow and somewhere."

F. A. E., Greenfield, N. H. "I am a firm believer in the power of prayer. God has blessed me many times, and recently my heart has been especially burdened, and I prayed most earnestly for an answer, but all was dark, but light has come and I feel sure that my prayer is answered."

A Reader. "As the Lord has helped me, as he has helped hundreds of others, I thought it might do some other poor soul good that is out of Christ. I was out of work all summer and prayed for work, and at last my prayer was answered. And I know he will help others as he has helped me."

A Reader. "I want to add my testimony in regard to answered prayer, hoping the faith of others may be strengthened thereby. Great trouble threatened, I made it a matter of prayer, promising if it was answered, I would acknowledge it. It was answered in an unexpected but welcome way."

Mrs. G. P. J., Massachusetts. "I promised the Lord that if he spared my daughter after a very critical operation, when all hope seemed lost, I would make this acknowledgment of it. He has answered my prayer, and other prayers that were offered for her recovery, and I want to thank Him and praise his holy name. The Lord hears and answers our prayers if we will only trust him."

Canadian. "I promised God that if he would restore to health a friend, who was so ill, that her death was hourly expected, I would acknowledge his goodness in the Answered Prayers column. He granted my petition, and also gave renewed health to myself. I have had many special answers to prayer. He always answers, even though he may not always grant the asked for boon."

H. P. A. P., Iowa. "My whole life is marked by milestones that are answers to prayer. For seven years I prayed that my Heavenly Father would save my husband. And when the call came to the palace of the King, an abundant entrance was given. If answers to prayer were stated more definitely, there would be more souls saved, and still more glory given to Him who answers the humble cry of his little ones."

Mrs. L. B. C., Stanford, Ky. "I want to add my testimony to the great host of those who believe in a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. I was in great trouble, and the dear Lord sent deliverance. I was sick, and the dear Lord sent healing. 'If we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us, and if he heareth us, we know we have the petition we ask of Him.' May the Lord bless the testimonies to the good and encouragement of all who read."

Called Higher

Mrs. Sylvia A. Niles was born at Sherburne, N. Y., April 30, 1820, and died at Indianapolis, Ind., October 8, 1904. At the age of twelve she gave her heart to God and continued in the faith until the day of her death, being at the time a member of the M. E. Church at Elwood, Ind.

Entered into rest on Sunday, Oct. 9, James J. Worrall, in the eighty-third year of his age. Another interested reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been called home. Unable as he was to hear a sermon from the pulpit, he delighted to read in his quiet home the sermons printed from week to week in this valuable paper.

Mrs. Elizabeth A. Green died at Larkin, Mo., on Oct. 26, 1904, aged sixty-seven years, five months and nine days. Mrs. Green united with the Baptist Church of Stewartville, Mo., in 1867, and at the time of her death was a member of the Larkin Baptist Church. She had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

Mrs. Lucy C. Clark, wife of Howard G. Clark, of Black River, and daughter of Wm. L. and Eliza C. Brown, of Lorraine, Jefferson County, N. Y.; born July 16, 1876, and died October 7, 1904. She was a member of the First Baptist Church of Black River, N. Y. Joined the church when seventeen years of age. She said all she could lead others to Christ and loved to read her Bible and meet with the children of God.

Mr. J. N. McGibbon, of Baltimore, who recently died, was one of the earliest patrons of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which he read with pleasure to the end of his life. He was a Christian gentleman of the old school, of high integrity, fine business qualities, honored by family and friends, and has left a character of spotless beauty.

On Sunday evening, September 18, 1904, at her home in Dinwiddie County, near Petersburg, Va., Mrs. Martha Elizabeth Watson Wells was called to her reward. She was widely known and greatly beloved in her community for her charitableness, being ever ready to lend a helping hand. She was one of the pioneer members of Market Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Petersburg, Va., in which she took great interest. She was a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which was a great help to her in speeding her on in her work.

God saw fit to remove to a better home Mr. Addison S. Hayes, of Hensonville, N. Y., on the morning of July 4, 1904. He died suddenly of heart failure, but he was prepared to meet his God. He was a veteran of the Civil War, having lost his right arm at Gettysburg. Mr. Hayes has for several years been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He loved to do the will of God. He was an elder of the Presbyterian Church.

Mary Jane Preston, widow of the late Rev. Edwin T. Preston, of Baxter, Ia., departed this life on June 2, 1904. She was born on June 15, 1825, in the then pioneer town of Ann Arbor, Mich. She had the honor of being the first white child born there. Mrs. Preston came of good Quaker stock, as did her venerable husband; and through life they retained the good qualities of that sect, always standing for righteousness, temperance and integrity in the individual and nation. Her family of six sons and two daughters are left to revere the memory of a true Christian mother.

Rachel Humphrey Allyn, M.D., was born in Charleston, Vt., April 25, 1810, and died in the same town, July 11, 1903, aged ninety-three years. Her father, Abner Allyn, came from Rehoboth, Mass., to Vermont, in 1796, and, in 1803, with wife and infant son, settled in this town. Seven years later, Rachel was born. She was early sent abroad for greater educational advantages, and comparatively few years of her long life were spent in her native town. Hers was an active life. She was for several years teacher of public schools in Vermont. About the year 1837 she went to Lowell, Mass. For several years she followed nursing in Lowell and Boston, then studied medicine, graduating an M.D. from a Boston college, and made the practice of medicine in Lowell her life work. She was early identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, gave and worked much for its prosperity.

A Marvel of Perfection

The Crown Dictionary came to hand yesterday. I have been examining it carefully, and have come to the conclusion that it is the most serviceable dictionary we have, and we have many, including Webster's Unabridged, National Pictorial, Academic, etc. The Crown Dictionary is a marvel of beauty and perfection for the first edition. . . . We admire your phonetic method of indicating the pronunciation of the words defined, also the broad-faced type of the words. It is a wonder to us that you can afford such a marvelous work for the additional sum of fifty cents to the regular subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This dictionary now stands at the left of the five volumes of the Crown Encyclopedia, making six beautiful volumes, amounting to more than 4,000 pages, at a cost of about $2.00! For these beautiful and highly useful premiums you will please accept my thanks. Respectfully yours, Montrose, Pa.

On My India Buffalo Farm

BY ALICE L. YODER

AFTER eight years' service in India, I lately returned to the United States on a brief furlough. I now take this opportunity of telling the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who helped us bear the burden of the famine and orphanage work, how their efforts and sacrifices were blessed to the helpless people of that far-away land. As the "mission mother" of two hundred native girls and widows, I have, with my own hands, distributed corn, bags, and blankets, sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to those who came for help from villages, towns, and the surrounding country. For miles around our station at Khamgaon, in Berar, India, could be seen the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the bags, worn afterward by the natives as a covering, thus serving a three-fold purpose—first, bringing the food; second, serving as clothing; and last, being a witness to all, for even though the natives could not read the name, yet they felt that the love of the people of America was manifested in caring for their great need. Besides our orphanage work, we cared for two hundred and fifty children until the end of the famine. When the relief camps closed, these returned with their relatives to their own villages.

All this extra labor entailed by the famine and the subsequent visitation of plague, broke down the strength of the workers, and made it necessary for me, among others, to take a furlough. Very reluctantly did I leave my dear brown girls, whom I had nursed and brought through so much trouble—some of them since they were mere babies—and without whom my life, even here in America, seems incomplete. At time I have been homesick to get back to them again.

I have been asked frequently since coming here, "What do your girls do for a livelihood?"

In the first place, there is no mill, no factory, no store, no ordinary source of employment available to them. A number of my girls are now old enough for service of some kind. It is evident that all cannot be teachers, nor even Christian workers, so I let them fill the places for which they are fitted by nature and training, and in which they will be most useful and contented.

As scarcely any meat is used by the natives of India, we need a great deal of oil, which is made out of a vegetable seed. Our girls press this oil, using a blind-folded bullock as the motive power for the rude press or machine. This industry has proved a great boon to our work. In one of our rooms you could find other hands busy with sewing on garments for the rest. We also teach them European sewing, which will serve them well wherever they may go in the future.

Then, a number of girls take great delight in weaving. I procured two fly-shuttle looms some time ago; but the work lately has been at a standstill, because no one there is able to teach the girls. Since coming to America, I have found a competent weaver who goes with me to India, where she will take charge of that department of the work. We expect that this industry will not only employ the girls while in the school, but that even after they leave the Orphanage, they can work at it as their trade. It will give our young native Christians an opportunity to support themselves.

Those who are markedly intelligent, and who desire an education, we encourage to go on, because we have much need of Christian teachers and Bible-women. From these we expect our future help in evangelizing.

Last, but not least of our industrial features, is our buffalo farm, which we started with one buffalo on September 1, 1898. In a little while we were so glad to have the rich, sweet milk, that we named the buffalo Muckti, meaning that she had been a gift of material salvation to us in this line. Later we were fortunate in getting a few more buffaloes, and soon we had six. God has blessed our farm-yard, like that of Jacob, so that now we have twenty-four buffaloes, large and small. The girls have all the care of these, as well as of all the dairy product. As buffaloes are peculiar animals, the milking requires skill, and is quite an art. While one girl is milking, another feeds and pets the animal. Then comes the process of boiling the milk to bring out the cream, which is afterward made into butter in our crude churns. The butter is next clarified, the product being called ghee. We have a market for this ghee all over the country. Even the Brahmins and Mohammedans buy from us. Milk and buttermilk mean much to the health of our Orphanage children.

We have only a few cows beside the buffaloes, and these ordinarily produce very little milk in India. I keep them for the nursery where our smallest brown children are. They are brought up on goat's milk. We have a number of goats which are tended by the smaller girls. It generally takes four girls to milk; one holds the horns, another the hind legs; the third the vessel for the milk, while the fourth does the milking.

We praise God for blessing our work thus far, and we believe there is yet a still greater future for it. As the farming implements of India are very crude, I am taking out with me, in addition to the two American ploughs I have already introduced, a windmill to pump water, and a pair of bullocks. I also take with me a few cultivators, a small drill, a subsoil plough, harrow, forks, rakes and hoes. A business firm in Kansas has given me a fine Dairy Cream Separator. Now as God has given us this, I believe he will give us all the rest that is needed.

I bought one field of twenty-two acres where we raise cotton and fodder. Adjoining this field there is excellent soil, of which we need fifty or sixty acres. We need a large plot for a garden, as the children live mostly on vegetables, and that will make it necessary to dig a well, for in India we cannot have gardens without irrigation. But our Father, who has promised never to fail us nor leave us, knows our needs and will supply them.

"The Christ of the Andes" der wars and insurrections have wasted the South American States.

Recently, as has already been stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the leading men of Chili and Argentine began to realize the folly and wickedness of this continual strife, and they came together at a conference and decided that peace and amity should prevail hereafter. A solemn compact of peace was entered into and the nations interested gave their approval.

The great statue stands at an elevation of 14,000 feet above the sea level. It is twenty-six feet in height. It rests on a granite pedestal, symbolizing the world, upon which is an inscription reading, "These mountains shall crumble to dust ere Argentine and Chili break the peace which, at the feet of Christ, the Redeemer, they have sworn to keep."

A Bowery Mission Funeral

(From the New York Sun.)

Henry McCluskey, an old man who died in the Bowery Mission last Sunday night (Nov. 27), while service was being held, was buried from the Mission yesterday.* It is said that he attended every meeting held there for the last five years. On Sunday night the place was so crowded that he had to sit on the stairs leading to the second floor. During the singing of a hymn he fell from the stairs and was found to be dead. McCluskey was a distinguished looking old man. Long before the service began the benches were filled with men. A couple of Salvation Army lassies sat on the platform. Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, or "Mother" Bird, as she is called, who leads many of the Bowery meetings, explained that the funeral would be simple.

"We might have bought him flowers," she said, "but it would have been a mockery. Just these few violets will do."

"If you could only see with a clearer vision," said the Rev. Stephen Merritt, after the congregation had sung, "you would find that our dead brother is now at rest in Abraham's bosom. I hope that I will see you all again in a better land. You will all be there, for no black sheep will remain among you. You will be washed whiter than snow."

One of the Mission workers sang, "And when I Think of the Home Land my Eyes are Filled with Tears." One of the undertaker's assistants sprinkled Mother Bird's violets upon the casket, and after the congregation had filed past, it was carried away.

*The poor old man, who was destitute, was buried by the Mission.

Mrs. Bird's Christmas Tree

CHRISTMAS is coming, and that is the one day of the year when the children of the East Side take full possession of the Bowery Mission, for they have learned by long experience that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD always has a big Christmas tree. I think, myself, there is no tree like it in the world. Last year our tree was over twenty-five feet high, and we always get the largest one in the market.

It has been a problem with us how to deal with the great crowd of excited children who, in former years, have gathered in front of our Mission so early on Christmas morning, sometimes hindering the traffic of the street. So great has been this crowd (the police estimated that last year it was 5,000) that our Superintendent, Mr. Halli-mond, has felt that it endangered life; so this year Dr. Klopsch has planned to have two kinds of tickets, one red and one blue, with a different hour marked on each kind. The children holding these tickets will receive their presents in the morning or the afternoon, as the ticket specifies. In this way, it is hoped we can control the great mass of children who throng the street.

Even now as I leave my home in the Settlement, I am honored by quite a following of neglected little folks, who pursue me with a vigor it is impossible to escape, each one eagerly inquiring, "When shall I come to the Christmas tree?" Their faith has been strengthened by the never-failing supply which comes from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and they are always told that it is Christ's friends who send their presents. One young girl, who is now a great help in our Settlement, and who for five years has been to our tree, has just told me it has helped to make her a better girl, and her eyes glistened at the thought of another happy Christmas in the Bowery Mission.

We find that nothing pleases the little girls like a baby doll. The spirit of motherhood seems to be inborn with them, and it is pathetic to hear even the little boys pleading for a doll for the baby sisters, losing all selfish thought of their own present, that the little ones at home may be made happy.

It is with deepest gratitude to God that he has put it into the hearts of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to brighten so many sad little lives on Christmas day, and our past experience has taught us that we need have no anxiety for this year.

Let us frown on the forces of distrust and disunion. Let us dissipate prejudice by dispelling ignorance. Whatever causes strife is a dead hand stretched out of a coffin past to strangle love and prevent progress. The things that will be most valuable in the twentieth century will be those that contribute to the get together idea. We shall have no use for Chinese walls of separation, for sectarianism, for sectionalism, or for individualism that arrays a man against society. The men who will be most valuable will be apostles of peace, evangelists of fraternity, diplomatists whose strenuousness has been toned by the Sermon on the Mount, statesmen who sit at the feet of Jesus, leaders not of a sect or faction, but leaders of men, in whose blood beats the race kin.

If so, is it likely that the twentieth century can get along without Christ? Christianity was never in such demand. It is the transforming force of the world. The personality of the Man of Galilee pervades life. His sweet influence heals the wounds of hate, his blessed teaching dispels avarice, the songs of his advent angels are heard above the hoarse blast of war trumpets. If together be the word for the twentieth century, then the matchless and inspiring leader for the twentieth century must be none other than Jesus, the Son of Man.

Men of high degree and men of low degree, men of privilege and men of needs, men of creeds and men of deeds, men of this land and men of other lands, men of the white race and the black race and the yellow race, men of faith and men of doubt, strong men and weak men, good men and bad men, men of the church and men of the world, get together, for all ye are brethren!

Golden Weddings

The fiftieth anniversary of the wedding of Rev. David L. Mitchell and Miss Emily Walker, was celebrated at the residence of Mr. A. F. Godat, in New Orleans, on Nov. 22, 1901.

The old couple, surrounded by their children and grandchildren, were radiant in their happiness, and their mood was reflected by all present on this joyous occasion.

Dr. Mitchell is one of the best known Methodist Episcopal clergyman in the South. He was ordained a minister of the Gospel in 1869, and for thirty-five years has waged the battle for the Cross. From 1878 to 1882 he was General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, and during the awful scourge of 1878 did noble work as Chief of the Association's Relief Committee.

For several years after his work with the Young Men's Christian Association he was religious editor on the Times-Democrat, and later was the publisher of the Christian Advocate.

Rev. Mitchell retired a number of years ago, and, with his faithful life partner, went to lead a quiet and calm life in Biloxi, Miss. He and Mrs. Mitchell are still residents of the thriving Gulf coast town, and came over to the city as guests of Mr. and Mrs. Godat to celebrate their golden wedding.

Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Jackman celebrated their golden wedding at their home near Leyden, Wash., on Oct. 25, 1904. There were over twenty-five guests present. The house was prettily decorated with autumn leaves. The couple were the recipients of many beautiful gifts.

On July 6, 1904, at Lakewood, O., the Rev. and Mrs. S. J. Parmiter celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. Four children and nine grandchildren were among the company. Many beautiful gifts were presented to the bride and groom of fifty years.

Vesper Hymn

BY VICTOR HUGO

GOOD NIGHT! Good night!
Far from us day wings its flight;
But like a celestial ray,
God's love is with us always;
It guards and keeps us all aright;
Good night! Good night!

Till to-morrow! Though who knows
What the morning may disclose?
Eyelids soon will close be drawn;
Shall we see again the dawn?
Vain, perchance, the wish we borrow
From to-morrow for to-morrow.

The Old Walls of Jerusalem

By THEODORE F. WRIGHT, Ph.D., OF CAMBRIDGE

STANDING to-day on nearly the same lines, on the west north and east, which they occupied centuries ago, the walls, once white, have grown yellow and gray and roughened; but we can see at once stones seven feet high and thirty long, and having the "Jewish bevel" or squared edge, while the central part of the face was not smoothed, and left "quarry-face."

After many destructions followed by terrible massacres, the present walls were built by the Sultan Suliman, in or about the year 1542, and he did not try to restore the wall which ran around the brow of Zion on the south, but on the other sides he followed the same, or nearly the same lines. As we look carefully, we can see what was standing when he went to work, and where he began to mend, using smaller blocks and taking anything that came to hand, bases of pillars as well as house blocks.

It has been found by excavation that he sometimes built a few feet away from the old line; and this is easily explained, for the old line was a mass of ruin at some points, and at such places he would not try to move the whole mass, but would start again nearby and pile the old stones on a new base.

The wall is nearly level on top, and therefore it must be built up much higher in some places than in others. It will be seen that it has a turreted top to protect its defenders, and the inside view will show that this turreted portion is much thinner than the rest, so that people could walk near the top of the wall. That can be done to-day by going up at one of the gates; but care must be taken not to offend householders, as most of the house-roofs are lower than the wall. It was a wall to be proud of, and so we find the Jews rejoicing over their beautiful city, and saying, "Peace be within thy walls, prosperity within thy palaces." Ps. 122:7. And in their prayer they said, "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem." Ps. 51:18.

The wall was strengthened at corners and at certain distances along its straight lines by what the Bible calls "towers," and so we read, "Walk about Zion and go round about her; tell the towers thereof." Ps. 48:12.

The principal gates were near the middle of the sides, and there were some others, as we see from the account given by Nehemiah. A gate is more than an opening through the wall. It has a right turn within it, so that it may be better defended. In a crowded city like Jerusalem, with very narrow streets, people who wished to meet others to trade or parley went to the gates. There, for instance, Absalom sat and spoke to those who came from the country and won their hearts to him from his father David; and there prophets took their stand to speak to the people.

It was apparently in Solomon's time that the present line of walls, west north and east, was built, and the

and had a passage over to the other hill, Zion. When the engineers were working here they calculated the arch, and found the other end underground on the side of the valley.

At one point, on the east, they also got under the wall, and found a great column, perhaps of Solomon's porch or colonnade, which had slipped down as far as it could go. On the bottom of this, they again saw mason's marks.

I have said that the south wall does not follow its old line. It is now nearly straight and goes across Zion, but formerly it swept around its front, making a perfect defence, so that the Jebusites jeered at David when he came to capture it. This old wall, however, has been completely uncovered recently by the American, Dr. F. J. Bliss, and he found towers and gates as on the other sides. He had to go down some feet to find the wall, and then to dig deeply to uncover it, but at one point he found a noble tower by a gate which led out toward Bethlehem, and which had been used so long that it had three thresholds, one above another.

This gate, which is probably the one which Nehemiah called the "Valley Gate," was toward the west. When he got along, eastward, to the turning point, he found a large gate which was probably what Nehemiah called the "Fountain Gate," for it led down to the well from which, in the summer, the people still drink. This gate had a paved street coming to it from inside the city, and, part of the way, it was so steep that it was cut in stairs, "the stairs that went down from the city of David" (Nehemiah 3:15). The Bible is always a correct guide to the explorer, as it is in the way of life—to the explorer, and to every one—"a light to the feet and a guide to the path" (Psalms 119:105).

When the fact is seen that the present walls of Jerusalem have no military strength, except against an attack of footmen, and when we find that the houses now extend beyond the wall on the west and north, we may fear lest this mass of building material may be used, as the pyramid stones were used to build Cairo; but here comes in fortunately the conservatism of the Moslem, who prefers old things to new, and we of America will join with him in this, and will always "take pleasure in her stones" Psalm 102:14. T. F. WRIGHT.

[The foregoing article from Dr. Wright's able pen, is of special interest and timeliness, in view of the exploration and excavation work now going on in different parts of the Holy Land, under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund].

ANCIENT TOWER ON ROCK PLATFORM NEAR THE ENGLISH CEMETERY, JERUSALEM

eastern wall was then very high, rising as it did from the slopes of Moriah and supporting the courtyard of the temple. The wall now shows huge stones near the ground, evidently of the original work; but we know well the whole wall at the southeast angle, because a shaft was sunk by the Exploration Fund a little way from the wall, and galleries were run to it, until at last the shaft was eighty feet down, and then the engineers were as low as the base of the wall. There, on one of the lower stones, was the red paint still bright, and it showed the marks of Hiram's masons, their personal marks as is supposed, and not a date or record.

It was as long ago as 1838 that Dr. Edward Robinson, in tracing the wall round the temple court, found certain stones which were built in to form the beginning of an arch. This was at the back of the temple, where Solomon built a special wall

A Cheery Outlook

THERE are people who never seem to enjoy the comfort of a cheery outlook, their chronic habit being to look on the dark side. On investigation, it is often found that these people are temperamentally mournful, that they have inherited from somebody in the past an inability to be hopeful, or that they have some organic trouble which weighs them down. The fact is, that both philosophy and religion justify us in maintaining good cheer on the road, and in expecting pleasant things rather than the reverse as we progress. Unless obstinately morose or dyspeptic, we ought to be cheerful on principle.

All life is a journey. In early childhood there is little struggle and little sadness, the troubles of that period being soon forgotten, and the cares of the time weighing very lightly on those whose raiment is provided, and whose food is daily spread by parental hands. Sometimes on the faces of children among the very poor, the shadow comes too soon, and the little ones know what it means to battle with want; but, generally speaking, children are care-free, and flit about like the birds, finding it natural greatly to enjoy the present moment.

Once we have passed the golden atmosphere of childhood, it is much harder to keep on hoping when the days are full of hardships, exactions and disappointments. Still it is a good plan to count our mercies. We may not have all the money our neighbor has, but, on the other hand, we may not have his peculiar solicitudes. Who is so thankful as he ought to be for uninterrupted health; for the shelter of the roof, which, though humble, is independent, to have the loyal love of kindred and friends and feel sure of their steadfastness?

Too often we take for granted these abounding mercies of our God, which are literally new every morning and fresh every evening. The great sorrows of life occur seldom. The constant stream of joy is the rule. There are more bright days than dark in most lives, and God is always bringing back the day, and the darkest moment is the one before the dawn.

Precautions against Fire

Now that the cold season is upon us and fires are burning in every house, we need to take more than ordinary care that our dwellings and places of business are guarded against fire. The safety of the flues should not be left to accident. From time to time chimneys and pipes should be thoroughly investigated, and the householder should be assured that there is no danger in these quarters to be dreaded. Every winter witnesses a great number of disastrous fires, involving sometimes terrible loss of life as well as devastation of property. Many of these fires would have been prevented by the most ordinary care. People are amazingly careless in their use of matches. A careless workman may throw down a match which he supposes to be extinguished. But it smoulders away, sets fire to shavings or the paper in the waste-basket, and the result may be a conflagration which destroys a large portion of the city, throwing multitudes of people out of work and making many families homeless. More than half the household fires that take place are due to this one cause: the heedlessness with which matches are thrown down anywhere when they are still lighted. To say the least, burnt matches are tokens of shockingly bad housekeeping, and are very destructive adjuncts to a tidy room. Some receptacle should be provided in every apartment, into which they can immediately be thrown. Matches should not be kept in paper boxes, even on shelves in closets. They are far safer if kept in tin boxes or safes. A mouse before now, prowling about in a closet, has set fire to things in the kitchen pantry by means of friction matches. Just a little mouse, a tiny match, and no end of woe. It goes without saying that children should never be allowed to play with fire: a thing that every child passionately desires to do, and no wonder! There is real joy in striking a match and lighting dry papers and leaves, and seeing them flame up before one's eyes. It is a joy akin to that of creation, but it is a perilous joy and must be forbidden to little children. It is far kinder to make a child afraid of fire, if there is no other way to cure him of the habit of playing with it, than to suffer him to indulge in a pastime which may be his death. To let the little hand suffer from a slight burn is trying to the mother's heart, but it is a passing pang and may save a greater one.

In the use of cleansing agents, such as naphtha and gasoline, precautions should be taken against their use in a room where there is lighted gas or a lamp or stove. These agents are very volatile, and in an instant a room or a woman's hair and dress may be in a blaze, if she

A Spelling Match

FROM time to time somebody writes asking what to do to make an evening pass pleasantly. No more agreeable way of spending an evening can be found than to have an old-fashioned spelling match. The spellers may be chosen in pairs, a boy and a girl, or a gentleman and lady on each side as opponents. The person who gives out the words must be a good speller. A list of words must be selected beforehand, and while such words as tax the memory and make recourse to the dictionary necessary may be included, it is well to remember that a great many people spell common words far from correctly. Our duty to our mother-tongue is sadly flawed when we do not spell words in ordinary use with exactness and nicety.

In her excellent book, Correct Writing and Speaking, Miss Mary A. Jordan, Professor of English Literature at Smith College, has some excellent things to say on this subject. She thinks we cannot give too much attention to accuracy in spelling. English spelling is not phonetic, and we cannot spell by sound. A spelling match would certainly give as much pleasure as a donkey party or a peanut spearing contest, or any other game in which prizes were offered, both to the most successful winner, and the greatest loser. A prize should be offered in a spelling match, and after it was over a few refreshments might follow, the simpler the better, to make the evening festive.

Quoting from Miss Jordan, some of my readers may be interested to hear what so brilliant an educator has to say about this very ordinary matter.

"Spelling, in the last resort, is a form of observational science. It is no more arbitrary, no more inconsistent, no more variable, than is the vocabulary and nomenclature of any science. As a field for training in the essentials of observation, nothing could be better suited to the purpose than the printed pages naturally coming in the way of the student in the grades. But the teaching is badly done. It lacks in significance, accuracy, and suggestion. Probably not ten out of a hundred teachers of the children in primary grades know appreciably more about a book as a mechanical contrivance, or the printed page as a result of combined art and science, than do the children. The same thing is true in regard to the sound value of the letters, and the varied histories they have undergone. It is considered hard work to teach children their letters and the so-called first principles of reading, but most of them fail to learn the principles, and so practice the art stumbly and falteringly all their days.

"If the print is the all-powerful factor in spelling, why are the children given so little practice in studying forms of print? On the contrary, the brighter the pupil, generally the earlier he forms the habit of reading what he thinks he sees, of following with part of his attention the carelessly seen forms on the page, and of trusting to his 'sense' of the meaning. The habit once acquired can with difficulty be gotten rid of. It extends absolutely to all parts of the printed word. They drop out of sight and out of mind together, and the effort to recall them is a definite obstacle to thought or its expression. Then grows up the device of the cautious. They limit their thinking to what they can say, not in words of one syllable, but in words they know how to spell. The influence upon their unwritten, unspoken thinking is lamentable. The unmelodious, uncharacteristic style of much student English has its main source in the habit of safe spelling. Phrases have come to be taken for granted by the mind behind the eyes, and the resultant is a curiously automatic process, and a poor apology for alert, appetitive reading. There is a very practical sense in which reading is coming to be a lost art through the curiously irresponsible way in which the student does his spelling, and the extent to which the printer has removed penalty from the sphere of the careless reader's experience."

Convalescence

Convalescence after an illness, is not a period that can be hurried. Sometimes the improvement made by a patient is so slow that it is marked by weeks, rather than by days. A week shows a gain. Twenty-four hours shows none that can be seen. But if the tide has turned towards health, it will continue to set steadily forward, unless there ensues what doctors most dread, a relapse. This must be guarded against with the utmost care, and by the exercise of much judgment. Few visitors should be received by a convalescent, and the diet and times for rest should be watched by a trained nurse, while the doctor is obeyed implicitly as when the illness was at its worst.

It was the custom in ancient Oriental lands to give what was called the "double." Our modern "note," in a way, is to be compared with it, and yet there is a difference. The "double," so to speak, was the note torn in two, one part to be retained by the creditor, the other to be given to the debtor. Probably from this custom came the word "indenture," now in use. When the debt was paid, the creditor passed over his section of the paper, and so the debtor received the "double," which exactly fitted into the piece already in his possession, and made it whole. We may use this custom as an illustration, and say that the recently excavated stones, obelisks, and sculptures are the "double" of certain historical parts of the Bible. They corroborate and make whole its statements.

JEWISH CAPTIVE

among them is an inscription reading "Kingdom of Judah." In II. Chron., chapter 12, we may read the whole story of how this King Shishak came against Jerusalem with twelve hundred chariots and three score thousand horsemen, and took away the treasures of the king's house, and the house of the Lord, even the shields of him as living in the time of King Asa, of Judah. It is said there is scarcely a line on this stone which has not its link either with the history, the geography, or the language of the Bible, and not only in this way corrobora-rating our previous knowledge, but adding to it, and so explaining, or illustrating, many points which had hitherto been perplexing and obscure. It is now in the Louvre in Paris. It is the "double" of the account to be found in II. Kings, chapter 3.

We glance now at the stone monument of Shalmaneser, erected by himself, for his grand palace at Nineveh. He also had made a black marble obelisk, one side of which is given in a picture herewith. It is seven feet high, and twenty-two inches wide. The inscriptions are sharply cut and well defined. Shalmaneser is represented as receiving the tribute of conquered nations, who lay at his feet offerings of gold, silver, copper in bars and cubes, goblets, shawls, and the tusks of elephants. They also bring camels, monkeys, antelopes, elephants and rhinoceroses. Among these nations are the Jews. Their features are said to be unmistakable. On the wings of two gigantic winged bulls, and on the black obelisk are inscribed records of Shalmaneser's campaigns, in which Ahab and Jehu, Kings of Israel, are mentioned. Both the black obelisk and the bulls are now in the British Museum. These monuments are the "doubles" of the records to be found in I. Kings 19: 9-18; II. Kings 8: 7-12. Prof. Hilprecht has said: "Until the present day, the black obelisk has remained one of the choicest historical monuments ever rescued from the mounds of Assyria."

Sargon was the successor of Shalmaneser. The campaign which was begun by Shalmaneser against the kingdom of Israel, was not completed before his death, but was consummated by Sargon in 721 B.C., when the captivity of the ten tribes was accomplished by him. The inscriptions on the Nineveh marbles contain the "double" of the Bible account to be found in II. Kings 17: 1-18.

The Sunday School pilgrims on the Grosser Kurfurst saw in the museum at Constantinople, in March, 1904, the richly carved sarcophagus of this same Sargon, and gazed upon his skeleton enclosed in a glass case close at hand. These had been brought to light only within the past ten years. The Taylor cylinder found at Nineveh in the year 1830, is the "double" for the records concerning King Hezekiah and his subjugation by the great Sennacherib, son of Sargon. These events are, however, a part of the lesson study for the year 1905, as we only began the life of Hezekiah in the latter part of the present year. The Taylor cylinder is now in the British Museum.

In the Saturday Review we find a summary by Captain Conder, who has spent the best part of his life in excavating, telling what we should know from the monuments concerning the Hebrews, had the Bible never been written at all:

1. The Hebrews were a people of common stock, with the Semitic inhabitants of Mesopotamia, but separating from them at an early historic period.

2. They worshiped Jehovah at least as early as 900 B.C., probably much earlier.

3. They possessed the art of monumental writing, and an alphabet of common origin with that of Phoenicia and Moab, some centuries before 700 B.C., and possibly as early as 1500 B.C.

4. They were pastoral agriculturists, craftsmen and traders. They possessed horses and chariots, flocks and herds, fenced cities and villages.

The Hebrew monarchs were attended by slaves and musicians, made use of ivory thrones, and had treasures of gold, silver, and precious stones, precious woods, and other articles of foreign origin. They defied at times even the Assyrian kings, and allied themselves with Egyptians and Babylonians.

6. The Hebrews had a non-Assyrian calendar, and thus probably some knowledge of astronomy.

7. It is probable that Hebrew literature was preserved on records written on papyrus and leather, but the knowledge of writing seems to have been confined to the scribes, and it was not extensively employed for sepulchral or other monumental purposes.

8. In civilization, there is every reason to suppose the Hebrews equalled their immediate neighbors, the Phoenicians, although, perhaps, not attaining to the condition of the Egyptians.

9. They buried their dead in rocky tombs without embalming, and there is no monumental evidence that they expected any resurrection of the mortal body so buried.

10. Their art seems rather to have approached that of the early Babylonian age, their buildings being adorned with metals and woods, while there is no evidence of the general cultivation of sculpture among them.

The value of these results, as Captain Conder points out, lies chiefly in their refutation of the destructive school. It should be noted that these conclusions are in perfect accord with the picture of Hebrew Society which may be drawn from the Books of Kings.

Professor Hilprecht adds to his history of exploration the following summary: "How much the interpretation of the Old Testament books have profited by these epoch-making discoveries, has not yet been realized. Being written in a language closely akin to Assyrian, and compiled by men brought up in the same atmosphere and surroundings, they frequently describe the very institutions, customs and deeds so vividly portrayed on the alabaster slabs of Nineveh. But it was not only through analogy and comparison that so many obscure words and passages in the Scriptures received fresh light and often an entirely new meaning—sometimes the very same persons and events mentioned in the historical and prophetic books of the Bible were depicted on those monuments, or recorded in their accompanying inscriptions."

Thus, as the Psalmist predicted, Truth has sprung out of the earth (Ps. 85: 11). From these long-buried monuments come evidences to answer the sceptics who have disputed the accuracy of the historical narratives of the Bible. They show that the events recorded there are confirmed by the Assyrian records, chiselled by command of the same kings whose very existence had been doubted. While men were disputing about them, these monuments were lying beneath sand and rubbish, their inscriptions preserved from decay, waiting the work of the excavator. In these late days, when they are most needed, they have been brought to light to confute the opponents of the Word of God. These inscriptions have not yet all been deciphered, but the work goes on steadily, and the discovery of others is anticipated. Who knows how long it may be before other inscriptions are found, confirming facts which are still matters of historical dispute.

The writer of the second book of Chronicles gives a summary of the crimes for which the judgment of God fell on his chosen people. He says (II. Chron. 36: 14): "The chief of the priests and the people transgressed very much after all the abominations of the heathen; and polluted the house of the Lord which he had hallowed in Jerusalem. And the Lord God of their fathers, sent to them, by his messengers . . . but they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, till there was no remedy." An awful indictment which ought to be read by every Christian nation. It shows the patience and long-suffering of God, but it implies that when there is no remedy, he strikes, and strikes hard.

MOLLY CAMERON

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"PAW," said Molly's mother, "Molly wants to go over the mountain to that Asheville school."

Paw was sitting by the open fire, his pipe in his mouth. He was a big, raw-boned mountaineer, grave and silent. There were seven sons and one daughter in the family. The daughter, Molly, was the pride of her father's heart and the light of his eyes.

"I reckon we'll have to let her go, if she's set on it, Maw," was all that he said, but he knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and with the slow, unhurried gait of the mountaineer, went out and up the road a piece. He did not need to put on his hat. It was never off his head except when he went to church, and that was seldom, there being no regular church services in the part of the mountains where the Camerons lived. Once in five or six weeks a preacher came round, and there would be a service, when the lean, gaunt men, and the thin, tired women would walk for miles, or ride on horseback to attend, their children often coming with them. These occasional services were the only gleams of culture that broke the monotony of the isolated life led by the people of Cameron's Creek.

The cabin of Aleck Cameron clung to the side of the mountain like a nest; the color of the woods and hills seemed to be absorbed in its walls of rough-hewn logs. Inside it was comfortable and warm. From its doors one looked into a wide sea of mountains, lifting their rugged shoulders everywhere, and shutting in the little hamlets and clearings as if within a fortress.

Aleck Cameron, blue-eyed, sandy-haired, with the high cheek-bones of his Scottish forefathers, came of the strong stock that, across the sea, bred poets and philosophers. Little learning had been his portion, but he was fond of reading, and the few books he owned had been read many times. Molly inherited his tastes. He had always felt that she would be a scholar if she had the chance, and yet he somehow resented her wish to go away from him, and attend school.

She was hurrying home, a slim girl in a blue cotton frock that fell in straight folds to her ankles. Her dark hair was hidden under a sun-bonnet, and a little gray shawl was crossed over her breast. Molly was very pretty. Her mother had once been pretty, though in her sallow face only he large, soft eyes retained any trace of beauty. Hard work, and a diet of bacon, hot bread, and strong coffee, make havoc of women's looks, in the mountains.

"So, honey," said her father, as the girl came tripping up to him, and slipped her little brown hand within his, "Maw says you hanker after schooling. That's because you talked to that preacher's wife o' long last Sunday. Would you go and eave us, daughter? I reckon you'd be mighty homesick, and want to come back."

"Yes, paw. I'd be mighty homesick, but I'd stay. It wasn't the lady altogether, paw. I've been a-wanting, an' a-wanting, an' a-wanting a chance this long time, an' I'm getting old, Paw. I've got to hurry if I'm not goin' to be too late."

"How old are you, honey?"

"Sixteen," said Molly Cameron. She said it as if she had been sixty. At sixteen girls often feel that they have attained a most mature age, especially girls who live in old-fashioned country neighborhoods, where their friends of eighteen and twenty are mostly married.

"Only, Paw, I do hate to ask you to spend the money. But after I've graduated, I'll work hard and pay you every cent. See if I won't."

"Shucks!" said the mountaineer. "I don't want you to worry over the money, laughter. If Maw can have you ready by day after to-morrow, I'll take you to the school, honey. I'm pretty sure you'll have grit enough to stick, once your thar."

What Molly Cameron suffered from shyness, and strangeness and longing, nobody knows except those who, like her, have found themselves in an environment utterly different from the accustomed one, and in a situation where everything has seemed unreal. Molly's ways were uncouth. She had not been trained to use a toothbrush, or to eat with her fork. She was not prepared to enter the lowest grade, but she could read and write, and the keys of all knowledge were therefore in her hand. Before long she had discovered the teacher she wanted to be like, and Miss Eliot became the model whom she copied, imitating almost unconsciously her gestures, her dainty neatness, and the refined enunciation and clear tones of her low, sweet voice.

At faculty meeting, when Molly Cameron had been in the school nine months, some one asked which of the three hundred pupils had made most progress since entering.

"Molly Cameron," was the answer, unhesitatingly given. "She has waked up. She is going to be brilliant; she is thorough; she has splendid capacity." Miss Eliot spoke positively.

"Yes, and she is growing very like you," another teacher remarked teasingly.

Virginia Eliot blushed. She was rather sensitive about the habit the girls had of adopting all her little ways. But the president, who was wise and experienced, set her mind at rest with a wave of his courtly hand. He was a true gentleman of the old school, and a born educator.

"Nothing is so fine in education as personality," he said. "We can do nothing so good for our girls as to impress ourselves upon them. But it is a great responsibility."

Gradually Molly's very appearance changed. She had no money for the little accessories of dress that girls prize, but clean turn-overs and cuffs cost a mere trifle, and a ribbon for the hair that is smoothly combed, may be managed, if a girl has initiative. There were opportunities to earn a little if the girls chose, and Molly was quick to avail herself of these. She helped in the kitchen, over-time. Part of her school work was there, but she gave hours for which she was paid a little. She was a very proud girl when she wrote home to her father that she had earned enough to buy her clothes for the next year.

She was walking across the campus one afternoon, near the end of the summer term, thinking happily that in a few days she would go home for vacation, and see them all again, when a telegram was put in her hand. Alarmed, her hands trembling so that she could hardly open it, she tore the envelope apart.

"Come," it said. "Mother died last night."

Miss Eliot went with her to the terminal of the railway, where a neighbor was waiting with a covered wagon and a team. There she left her. Molly had not shed a tear. The dry-eyed misery in her face touched her teacher's heart. She could not comfort her. As they parted, she said, "Molly, you must be brave. You will have the rest to comfort, my dear."

"I ought not to have left Maw. If I had staid she might be alive now." It was the old, old plaint, as old as earth itself, that love and bereavement are always making.

There was no returning to school next year. Instead, Molly tried her best to fill her mother's empty place, but it was not easy. The mother had pervaded the home, as mothers do. Her simple house-wifery had absorbed her life, and no one had dreamed how it had exhausted her. When Molly had the cooking, scrubbing, sewing, washing, and all to do for the boys and her father, she found that it taxed her whole young strength to get through it. She began to grow round-shouldered and heavy-eyed. The slowly moving months dragged along. She was poring over a Latin Grammar by the light of a pine knot, one afternoon in the gathering dusk, when her father, more taciturn now than ever, came in and looked at her.

"Honey," he said. "You can pack your trunk and go to school next year, and finish."

"But no, father. I can't be spared." Yet he saw the flash, not from the fire, that illumined her face.

"Yes, you can, Molly. I'm goin' to be married."

Now she turned pale, and her face took on a resentful expression.

"I've not forgot your mother. I never shall. But you need your own life. I need a housekeeper. Martha Steele will make me a good wife, and she'll take care of the boys. You go back to school, honey."

It was a long speech for Aleck Cameron. He added to it after a moment, "Your mother had a gold watch, honey, and a black silk dress, and a little white shawl. She would have wanted you to have them. I'll put them in your trunk myself. When you are through school, you can be a lady and teach if you like, and you can help me educate the boys. Teddy is a smart little chap." Teddy was the youngest.

Several years later, a traveler passing through the Cameron Creek region saw a little church, its white spire pointing heavenward, and near it a small school-house, with thrifty plants and bright vines around its door.

The hamlet that focussed most of its activity around the blacksmith's shop and the store, had an air of clean prosperity formerly lacking. A definite tidiness had taken the place of dirt and disorder. The saloon had vanished.

"Seems to me," said the stranger, "there's an improvement here. You've been forging ahead."

"Right you are," said the blacksmith. "That little girl of Aleck Cameron's, when she came home from school went straight to work. She persuaded us to build the school. Then she started a Sunday School and a singing service in the school. On top o' that she begged us to build a church. We did. We've got a minister now, an' he preaches every Sunday. Molly Cameron, with the Lord's help," here the old fellow took off his hat, "has, to put it mildly, transmogrified this community. Yes, sir, she has."

Molly Cameron, a tall, gentle girl, was pointed out to the stranger later. He looked at her, noted the firm mouth, the womanly brow, the tender, lustrous eyes, and knew that she and others like her were quietly revolutionizing the land of their birth.

"God bless her," he said. "God help her," and rode out of the mountains. From his far-away home later, he sent an organ for Molly Cameron's Church.

THE sunshine floods the hills with liquid gold,
Spring's leaping pulses throb through sod and tree,
With happy promise tender buds unfold,
And brimming rills go laughing to the sea.

Rare tracteries of mingled fern and flower
Rim crystal pools that catch the sky's blue glow,
And dark madronas hang their glossy bowers
With torches that sway softly to and fro.
Gray walled and dusk the canyons wind away,
'Twixt sunbright hill slopes, freshly washed and green,
Unchallenged in their deeps the shadows play,
And over them the fragrant laurels lean.

The holly glows against embowered walls,
From oaken limbs hangs mistletoe, pearl-starred,
And here and there, like faithful senechals,
Gray-beard sequoias keep their watch and ward.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Mrs. Barr's Latest Book

IN The Belle of Bowling Green, by Amelia E. Barr, we have a story of a century ago. The tale concerns the fine old families who lived in the neighborhood of Bowling Green when that historic spot was the abode of New York's most aristocratic citizens. There are two beautiful young girls who occupy the centre of the stage, while this comedy of old-time life is being played; but some of the other characters are equally interesting, notably that of Grandmother Bloomaert, with her quaint phraseology, and sharp to-the-point sayings. When Judge Gerardus Bloomaert built himself a handsome dwelling, he desired no fairer site for it than the Bowling Green, for had not Bloomaert's lived for more than a century in the old Beaver Path, and in Bloomaert's Valley, or Broad Street. In this lofty, roomy house of red brick, we find Sapphira, the Judge's only daughter, a charming young woman of eighteen years.

We are told that the young gentlemen of New York found the road which led past the stately dwelling very often the path of their desires, for there was always a chance that a fleeting glance of the lovely Sapphira might be caught at one of the windows. Sapphira was a charming combination of her Dutch and French ancestry, for her mother Carlita, was of the latter race, and a strain of noble blood was in her veins.

Annette, Sapphira's cousin, lived with her grandmother, the imperious, stately, and somewhat sharp-tongued Madame Bloomaert. The author gives a delightful description of this lady's home on lower Nassau Street, which was as Dutch as herself in character. A large garden surrounded the house, over whose wide casements a sweet-briar climbed, while the veranda was a perfect bower of trailing vines. Annette was a rather selfish, volatile sort of girl, beautiful, of course, and as she did not seem to have a particularly overweening regard for anyone except herself, and did not hesitate to stretch the truth a bit at times, if it was to advantage to do so, one may be pardoned the wish that these lovely maidens' names could have been exchanged, and thus have been more in keeping with their individualities. There were five brave young men, who were helping to make history as well as love, two were Sapphira's brothers and another her honest young lover, Leonard Murray by name. The Judge, Sapphira's father, does not favor the young man; but in spite of this, and the fact that the beautiful Annette developed a decided disposition to annex young Murray to her train of admirers, the young man won his way with Sapphira.

Our national misunderstanding with England, which culminated in the war of 1812, was brewing at this time, and so, between preparations for war, which seemed to rather accelerate love making among the young people, all hands were kept pretty busy.

In the fourth chapter Mr. Achille St. Ange is introduced, and proves a most charming addition to the company. This young man had the "air and manner of a prince;" "his slight, agile figure had the erect carriage of one born to command, and his general appearance and aspect were suggestively haughty." "His hair was intensely black and soft, and lay in straight locks on his brow; his eyes, equally dark, were full of sombre fire; his skin had the pallor of the hot land from which he came." The capture of the frivolous Annette by such a young Apollo as this was but a question of a very short time. Still, this did not prevent Annette, the frivolous, from making trouble for Sapphira, and this, added to the fact that young Murray was making arrangements to study law under Aaron Burr, was a combination anything but favorable for the course of true love. Judge Bloomaert and all the other good Dutch citizens had a very poor opinion of Mr. Burr, after the Hamilton affair, and they were not at all reticent about expressing the same. There was another young man also who insisted upon making trouble for Murray, who at last forced him into a duel, much to the discomfiture of the bad young man, before the meeting, and his utter rout at the time. We, of this budding twentieth century, need not think we are having all the strenuous times to ourselves.

All these good people of Bowling Green were kept moving rapidly, and the author gives us a charming picture of the domestic and social life of the period of which she writes, when silver was heavy and solid, and beautiful brocades and laces were cherished with such care, that they were worthy to descend to even the third and fourth generation. The last chapter, "Afterward," brings the story up-to-date, in an unexpected manner, thus finishing the tale in a highly satisfactory way.

Here's to the homes that are past!
Here's to the men that have been!
Here's to the heart of New York
That beats on the Bowling Green.

HISTORY OF HIRAM COLLEGE

History of Hiram College, by F. M. Green, A.M., LL.D. The story of the inception and founding of the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute, has been traced in detail by the author, who has been intimately associated with the college since its early years. The work is of great value as a history, and the personal reminiscences are interesting, especially so are the chapters dealing with the period of James A. Garfield's connection with the institution. At one time when the future President of the United States was a student at Hiram, a lecture was delivered at the college by a man named Treat. This man had read a few infidel books, and was audacious enough to give voice to his disbelief in Christianity, and then challenged anyone in the audience to answer him. He made a most venomous attack on the Bible, saying that the translations were not reliable; that the Bible was written in Hebrew and Greek, had been translated by designing and dishonest priests, etc. Up rose young Garfield, and said he would like to ask the speaker one question, viz.: "Would the lecturer be so kind as to tell the audience what was the present participle of the verb to be in Greek, or, in other words, the greek word to correspond with the English word being?" Treat could not answer because he did not know. Then Mr. Garfield turned to the audience and asked what they thought of a man traveling over the country criticising the work of the world's great scholars, when he did not know the first thing the schoolboy learned in his Greek grammar. This man sought to overthrow the Christian's faith and dethrone the Christian's God, while passing himself under false colors, pretending to knowledge he did not possess. Mr. Garfield then gave an impassioned eulogy upon the Bible, as the creed of the mightiest nations, the accepted moral guide of the grandest men in history, and the only light in the darkened world, leading to eternal life and peace. The audience was electrified at his power and eloquence, and the infidel was silenced. Published by The O. S. Hubbel Printing Company, Cleveland, O. Price $1.50.

Railroading with Christ, by Rev. Chas. A. S. Dwight. This is the rather startling title of a story of a brave engineer who lost his life in the discharge of his duty. His dying words, "Tell my little Joe to be a man," became the watchword of his son, who became in turn a Christian engineer. Published by American Tract Society, 150 Nassau

The Wandering Twins: A Story of Labrador, by Mary Boucher Sanford, is a tale in which young people will delight. The adventures of Ulrica and Ivan the twins, who went to Labrador in search of their father, is charmingly and sympathetically told, while the readiness with which the brother and sister adapted themselves to the strange life which they found in this far northern country, runs like a bright thread through the whole narrative. The fisher folk, the cottage on the crag, the cave in the fiord, the hut in the valley, are skillfully blended in the picture of life in Labrador. Of course the twins did not find their father at first, else there would have been no adventures with the Indians, no "Loup Garon," no thrilling experiences when adrift on the ice. It would not be fair to tell the story of the joyful reunion at last. To know how it all came about, read the adventures of the "Wandering Twins," published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, Ill.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD*

HOW much better than he knew, did Isaiah write! In his mind it was deliverance from the yoke of Assyria that was the blessing hoped for. But the inspiring voice given to him led him to write of a deliverer greater than he could conceive. As Peter expresses it (1. Peter 1:10, 11), the ancient prophet must have wondered "what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in him did signify." The people for whom he wrote, and their descendants, were just as much in the dark. They, too, only looked for a deliverer who should drive out the oppressor and make Israel once more an independent nation. If Christ would have done this, he would have been welcomed. If he had come as a teacher, he would have been welcomed; but a teacher who claimed to be the long-expected Messiah, yet who would not fight, nor set up a standard of rebellion against Rome, was rejected in disgust as an impostor.

How much greater Christ proved, than the people conceived him! The deliverance of the little nation would have been an infinitesimal task, compared with the mission which he came to accomplish. If he had succeeded in emancipating his people, his name might have gone down to history as a great general, like the Maccabees, or like Garibaldi, but the great outside world would have derived no benefit from his coming. It was something far wider that he had to do. The world enslaved by sin, hopeless of attaining freedom from its galling chains, knowing nothing of the glorious freedom of the sons of God, was to be shown the possibility of becoming free in soul and of fulfilling the destiny that God designed for the race. It was as the world's Messiah that Christ came. He came as the helper to men in far-off regions, and in far distant times, who were each struggling to become good, and in bewilderment groping after the way. He came to extend a mighty hand to the buffeted sinner in every land and time who felt the powerlessness of his struggle and was losing hope of ever succeeding in his own strength. The encouragement of a brother, the love of a Saviour who had sacrificed his life to save, Christ brought to him, and the poor, weak mortal took new heart, relying on divine strength. "To him that overcometh," he said, "I will give power." The celestial forces, then, were on the side of every man who would make the fight. This was a new message, a light in a dark place, that is growing brighter still, from day to day.

* Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for Dec. 25. Isa. 9:2-7.

THE WAYSIDE MISSION HOSPITAL, COUNCIL CITY, ALASKA

SEVERAL years ago, Dr. Alexander de Soto founded a Wayside Mission and Hospital in Seattle, Wash. On leaving that city for Alaska, he settled at Council City, some seventy-five miles distant from Nome, where he founded a new Wayside Hospital for the benefit of the mining community. He also established a Mission there, which for several years past has done excellent work in a community which till then had been sadly deficient in religious privileges.

Since the opening of the Wayside Hospital at Council, it has been of the greatest service to the miners. It is conducted by an efficient hospital staff of physicians and trained nurses, and the general equipment is excellent. Dr. de Soto personally looks after the interest of the hospital he founded and has been its principal support. At the time the photograph was taken, it was midwinter in Alaska, with bitterly cold, dry weather, and Council was shut off from the rest of the world by snow.

AN OFFERING TO CHRIST*

THAT Christ appreciates personal service and personal love is evident from the care he took that the act of the woman, in breaking the alabaster box and pouring the ointment over him, should be one of the very few incidents related by each of the four evangelists. Evidently he wished that act, for some reason, to be so kept in the history of his life, that it could not be overlooked. Though he was so humble, so accessible, he held tenaciously to his own royal dignity and asserted his claim to homage. Throwing over the woman the mantle of his protection, he accepted her tribute and declared that she had done a good work. Though the value of the ointment was equivalent to fifty-four dollars of our money, which in those times meant a year's wages for an ordinary laborer, he would not have it pronounced waste, when it was used upon him at one time. It was an expression of love, the act of one who thought nothing too good for her Lord, and it was accepted graciously, for the sake of the affection that it proved and symbolized.

It is these acts of personal service, this indication of personal love that he still values. He is the centre of Christianity. Those who would make him a mere teacher and Christianity a mere system of ethics must inevitably fail. He is a King demanding personal allegiance. The cup of water given to one because he belongs to Christ, is not to lose its reward. Those who feed the hungry and visit the sick are blessed because in their service they are serving Him. He longs for personal loyalty. "Follow me" is his injunction still. The charity that helps the poor out of mere pity is enhanced a hundred-fold when it is an expression of love for Him. The gift may be small and poor, but its value is not measured by its worth in money, but by the love which it expresses. The self-denial of an act is appreciated when it is a sacrifice to Him. The man who gives up an evening's pleasure that he may spend it by the side of some Christian invalid; the woman who out of her slender store carries some gift to a Christian in need, if the act is prompted by the desire to please Christ, is taken account of and will be rewarded. The motive counts. And truly the desire is not unreasonable. He did so much for us, he loved us with such an intense love, that personal response is craved and longed for. None are so poor that they cannot show their gratitude, but it is more than gratitude that He asks. It is the love of the heart. The love that will bear everything, do anything that will show its existence, that He yearns for.

Gospel Triumphs in Brazil

THE CONGREGATION OF THE MISSION CHURCH AT SAO PAULO

SINCE our last letter, acknowledging financial help so kindly sent us by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we have been led, by God's providence, to change our headquarters from Sao Paulo, where we worked four years, to the beautiful, cheerful city of Porto Alegre, in the extreme south of Brazil. The work in Sao Paulo being strong and well organized, we were impelled to enter a new and very needy field.

Since the day of our arrival we have been conscious of God's peculiar blessing. Even in our purchases of household goods, we met with people who listened eagerly to our talk about Christ, and who promptly appeared at our first meeting. Thus we found our congregation in the shops and in the course of our house-to-house visiting. One of the best known business men in Porto Alegre, manager of a large furniture factory, sold us some of his wares. We took occasion to invite him to come to the meetings. He became a constant attendant. He obeyed the call to repent, and to believe the Gospel, has forsaken his sins, and has been the means, in God's hands, of bringing many persons here, whose hearts were likewise prepared to hear and obey the Gospel. This gentleman's wife was very averse to his coming, and she positively refused to attend, being deep-dyed in Romanism, through years of education in nunneries. Seeing her husband, however, so wonderfully transformed, and always eager to attend the meetings, she felt curious to see what the attraction was, and so, she came, full of prejudice. She went home a converted woman, desiring and professing to walk in the light of the Gospel. Her sister, too, has come over on the Lord's side. A young man, a friend of theirs, who was so hopelessly depraved that even his Popish confessors refused him further absolution, has been converted by the power of Jesus, and is now a good, clean, godly man.

We met a very poor, destitute family of father, mother, and two little children of ten and twelve. The man had been sick for eleven years. He had not been able to work, and the poor woman, single-handed, had struggled all those years to support the family. Hunger and want were members of that wretched, dark, damp, dirty household. The Gospel light streamed in, and was welcomed, and the parents turned to Christ, and found in him a great and mighty Friend. He has saved them from their sins, and now the man's health is returning. He is well enough now to work. Better days are in store for that house.

Our meetings are attended by many educated and respectable people, who, although Catholics, are quick to recognize and to appreciate the truth.

After three weeks' work, we already have sixteen who have confessed Christ, and promise to turn out well. Our preaching has been almost entirely on repentance. Extraordinary interest is manifested, and also much opposition. Recently, the students determined to make an attack, and break up our meeting. A number came, looking for trouble, and several men who sympathized with us, hearing of the threatened attack, came armed with revolvers, as we afterward learned. We felt the trouble in the air, and prayed about it, asking God to help us. That night the students came in, but made no disturbance. The simple Gospel fastened deep conviction on them. They afterward apologized for the harm they had intended to do, and said they were convinced that we were preaching God's truth, even if it is not to their taste. The priests work secretly against us, but, thank God, the same people keep coming night after night.

Rio Grande do Sul is the most progressive and most prosperous State in Brazil. The numerous German colonists have made it what it is, in agricultural enterprise and manufactures. Porto Alegre is the capital, with about 100,000 souls. It is a delightful city, even though undrained and poorly supplied with water. The people are more genial and pleasing and hospitable than any we have met in Brazil. We have been splendidly received here by rich and poor, high and low; in fact, we have entered the most inviting and promising door that God has yet opened to us.

Our other eleven stations are doing well, and all the work is going forward in blessing. We are hoping soon to send out missionaries to the unevangelized Indian tribes of Central Brazil. Some of our brethren are desirous of giving their lives to this labor of love, and we are looking to God for select men amongst our native converts, and for a supply of men, which will enable us to send the Gospel to the primitive Indians of interior Brazil.

What little experience these poor Indians have had of the white man has been unmixedly bad. From the white folks they have received fire-water, immorality, cruelty and barbarous ill-treatment. It is high time they were ministered to.

The enclosed group was taken just before our departure, and represents a large part of the church, although many do not appear there.

Little Sam's Thanksgiving

LITTLE SAM, aged 4½, had been playing in the yard. His hands were cold. He felt the chill of the evening. A lady called him into her warm kitchen. He spread his little hands over the stove in a most enjoyable way. She placed before him a bowl of milk and bread, and said to him, "Sam, you must thank God for this nice fire. He has made it ready here to warm you; and see, he has given you biscuit, and such nice milk." The lady had forgotten the corn bread she had crumbled in the milk. Sam drew in a long breath, and, looking up, said, "Thankee for de Lord, de fire, de biscuit, and de chorn bread."

He then ran merrily to his mother's house and said, "My mar, look at my new pants, and thankee for de Lord."

His thanksgiving was so hearty and unique that I thought you would enjoy it.

WHAT MIGHT HAPPEN, IF THE BLACK SEA FLEET FORCED THE DARDANELLES

WILL Russia's Black Sea fleet attempt to force the passage of the Dardanelles, and to run the gauntlet of the Turkish forts and guns, or will the Sultan, while professing opposition, secretly consent to its passage? This is the question that is again being discussed in Europe's capitals, since the destruction of the Port Arthur Squadron. It would not surprise any of those statesmen who are most familiar with the intricacies of Russo-Turkish diplomacy, to find, some morning, that the Czar's long-embargoed warships had swept past the Sultan's batteries, and was on its way to the Far East. There are many who will recall the passage of the Dardanelles by a portion of the British Mediterranean Squadron, some twenty-five years ago, when no Turkish gun sought to halt them. It is true, the land batteries may have been considerably strengthened and modernized since then; but there is hardly a doubt that if the Russian Admiral should be ordered to make the attempt, the Bosphorus forts would be powerless to prevent his passage. The Dardanelles fortifications, however, are powerful and modern, and difficult to overcome.

A section of the Russian press which is believed to have close connection with "influential personages," agitates the forcible abrogation of the treaties which closed the Dardanelles to warships in 1841. They argue that no attempt would be made to prevent the passage of the Russian ships, and that, though Great Britain might object, no force would be employed. It is said that the Dowager Czarina strongly approves of moving the fleet to the Far East at any cost, and she voices the opinions of a large court party.

On the other hand, there are Russians who argue that if Russia is allowed to send out war ships, other countries can send in theirs, and that this would bring even greater injury to Russia in the future, than could be compensated for by any benefit derived at present by letting out a fleet, which is more or less antiquated and inefficient. The Black Sea fleet includes at present, one first-class battleship; seven battleships of the second-rate in fighting power, and three of such limited radius of action that they cannot be sent very far away from opportunities for coaling. There is also a lack of cruisers; four are being built, two being in a stage nearing completion. Still there are enough vessels to make a gallant fight, should Russia determine to run the gauntlet of Turkish fortifications along the Bosphorus, and should Turkey oppose the passage in earnest, such a conflict would result as Europe has seldom witnessed.

Many splendid palaces and other noble specimens of architecture line both shores of this most picturesque and beautiful waterway. From the "Golden Horn" to the Black Sea, the Bosphorus is like a garland, woven by the hand of beauty, where each blossom seems brighter than the last.

The beautiful strait dividing Europe and Asia could not spare a rock, a tree, a tower, palace or mosque, without sustaining a distinct loss in its majestic loveliness. On either shore of the Golden Horn are castles, standing on the nearest point of approach be-the swiftly-moving current, cypress and pine mingling their dark and solemn foliage with the ever-shifting tints of brighter leafage. Beautiful mansions, backed by lofty hills, extend for about twelve miles on either shore, palaces and kiosques of the court occupying the finest sites, their bright facades and fanciful parapets glittering in the sun. The "Kiosque of the Sun" is perched on the top of a rock, on the Asiatic coast; it is Grecian in outline, and standing in strong relief against the blue of the sky, this imperial structure well merits the praise that is implied in its name.

Constantinople is a city of seven hills, with intervening valleys. The main streets of the present day follow the lines of the old city of Constantine. The Golden Horn, thus named for its fancied resemblance to a stag's horn, is a peculiar harbor, dividing the promontories on which the Ottoman capital lies. This inlet curls up in a course of a little more than four miles, to the foot of the hills, which, joining the heights on either side, seem to create a vast amphitheatre.

Two bridges span the Golden Horn, and unite Galata and Pera with Stamboul (the ancient name of Constantinople). Galata and Pera are chiefly inhabited by Christians, native and foreign. Pera, is a Greek word, meaning "the region over the water," and formerly this name embraced that part of the town now called Galata.

The mosques of Constantinople many of them retain the materials as well as occupy the sites of the ancient Christian churches. The Imperial Mosques stand on high ground, and with harmonious contrast of dome and minaret, present a pleasing picture. The hills may be counted, as the lordly structures follow in stately order, and the different monuments to the Moslem prophets seem to repeat the form fixed upon the first hill. On high festivals, these soaring minarets beam with festoons of light, shining out like beacons over the waters. The star and crescent have superseded the Cross as a religious emblem. Even in beautiful St. Sophia, the first stone of which was laid in the year 532; 10,000 workmen were said to have been engaged under the direction of 100 master-builders in the erection of this noble church. In 1453, it was profaned, and converted into a Mohammedan mosque.

tween the two coasts which, in some instances, as the traveler approaches, seem to close the channel; but as he slips onward in the rapidly moving caïque, one beautiful curve is succeeded by another and another, while mirrored in the waters of the Bosphorus are groves, hamlets, palaces, and magnificent turreted mosques. Here and there are solid outlines of rock, diversified by glens and inlets, beautiful in their fresh and vivid green. Valleys studded with trees whose branches hang over

MYRIAD BOOKS

TEXT—Eccles. 12 : 12 :

"Of making many books there is no end"

WENDELL PHILLIPS for many years went up and down the land delivering a lecture entitled, "The Lost Arts." That lecture was, in most respects, a glorification of the past. If, however, we should halo the present and deliver a new lecture entitled, "The Found Arts," almost without exception, most of us would catalogue the art of book-making as among the greatest of all modern accomplishments. In our egotistic self-complacency, many of us have long supposed that the ancients knew but little about books. We look upon the great English and American, and French and German, and Russian libraries as modern developments which would be just as incomprehensible to our ancestors, if they should suddenly come to life, as would be the telephone, or the telegraph, or the electric car, or the modern steam-engine. Thus, when some of us to-day hear the words of my text, we are amazed. We say to each other, "What did King Solomon mean when he said, 'Of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness to the flesh.' Were there many books in King Solomon's time? Or was he, in prophetic vision, hearing the bangings and the crashings of the modern twentieth century printing press?"

Ancient Authors

No. King Solomon was not hearing the bangings and crashings of the modern printing press. He was listening, however, to the scratchings of the scribes' pens. The book-makers were then very busy everywhere. They must have been busy at that time. Homer, the greatest of all poets, both living and dead, certainly lived and wrote not more than a few years after Solomon died. Thucydides, Aristophanes, Demosthenes, Herodotus and Solon, whose writings are placed among the classics of the ages, wrote their thoughts only a few hundred years after King Solomon lived. Five hundred years before Solomon was born, the Lord said to Moses, "Write this for a memorial in a book." That Moses was well qualified for the task we have abundant proof. Long before his day men had written books, cumbrous productions in baked clay that as a boy in Egypt he had laboriously conned. The practice of writing books was continued, and the ancient authors had become so prolific that the author of Ecclesiastes felt as most of us do in trying to dig our way out from amid the avalanche of the literature of the present day. "Of making many books there is no end," the wisest of all men cried three thousand years ago. "Of making many books there is no end," we cry, in the beginning of this twentieth century.

Myriads of books surround us. The Congressional Library alone has over 2,000,000 of them. The new library building has accommodations for 2,500,000 more, making in all, space for 4,500,000 books. Books, books, books, books, books everywhere! Books in different forms as newspapers. Books as magazines. Books recording the histories of nations. Books as biographies. Books in fictitious story or in novel form. Books in rhythmic metre, or as poetry. Books in sermon and theological dissertation. Books as essays. There are millions and millions of them—good books and bad books. Now comes the practical question: What shall we do with these books? They come to us to assist or retard, to re-enforce or to enervate us in the struggle of life. How shall we use them? How shall we decide which are helpful and which are injurious?

Choice of Books

A man's library, in the first place, should be like the sanctuary of his heart, into which he admits only his best friends. It should have room for only a very few and a carefully chosen collection of books. These should be read and re-read, and read again. Like our dearest friends, they should enter into the very warp and woof of our being. They should not be mere personalities, with whom we have only a speaking acquaintance. They should not be those half-strangers to whom we have to be reintroduced every time we meet them away from our homes. They should become integral parts of our mental, moral and spiritual being. We should be so sure of their wisdom that we can accept them as our guides, to inspire us to right thinking, right speaking and right acting. Rare indeed are such books! When they have been found, they should be treasured as more precious than gold; but let us not expect to find many of them.

"A library to have only room for a few books? What do you mean by that assertion?" some one says. "Why, I always thought the more books a man reads, the better he is educated, taking for granted, of course, that the books he reads are good books. My parents educated me along these lines. When I was growing up, my mother used to give me ten cents for every book I would read. The result was I could read a whole book through in a couple of days. Thus, in my time, I have read all of the popular novelists. In the same way, by my rapidity of reading, I am able to some extent to keep abreast of the literature of this day. Oh no, you are wrong. The more books a man reads, the more he knows. The less a man reads, the less he will know. 'Reading,' said Lord Bacon, 'makes a full man.'"

A Surfeit of Reading

Am I wrong? I believe to-day, that one of the curses of this age is too much reading and too little thinking. Men and women cram themselves with a lot of mentally undigested literature in the same way that many people become gourmands at a dining-table. It is not the amount of food you put into your stomach that makes you a strong man. It is the amount of food you digest. We should think a man very silly who said, "I want to make myself a physical giant. I am, therefore, going to eat enough food for ten men. At breakfast, I will have the cook bring to me three pounds of beefsteak and a dozen eggs and a half a bushel of mashed potatoes, and I sit there and try to eat them all. When dinner comes around, I will try to eat a whole leg of mutton, and when supper comes, a great big roast of beef." What would happen? His digestive organs would revolt. His body would be racked with pain. Perhaps peritonitis would set in, and death would be the result of his folly.

Now, as some gourmands abuse their stomachs with too much eating, so some gourmands for mental food abuse their brains with too much reading. They stuff their minds with whole piles of indigestible literary food. They read and they read and they read. They keep on reading, and never think or care about what they are reading. They read until at last their brains absolutely refuse to do any independent thinking. Their brains become like a great sponge, filled with water, sodden and heavy and inactive, of no earthly use to anybody, or anything. What you ought to do is not to see how many books you can skim through, but how many books you can master.

Master Your Books

"Look out," says the old adage, "for the man who is master of one book." Look out, say I, for the master of a few great books. Too much reading truly becomes a weariness to the flesh. Mr. Spurgeon, in one of his sermons, quotes the invective which Lucian, in D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature, makes against those men whose pride is in a large library, which they never properly read, and therefore cannot profit by. "Such a man is like a pilot, who has never learned the art of navigation, or a cripple who wears embroidered slippers and cannot stand upright in them. Why do you buy so many books? You have no hair, and you purchase a comb: You are blind, and you must need buy a fine mirror. You are deaf, and you will have the best musical instruments." But the foolishness of buying a library of books for the shelf so that you can look upon their handsome bindings, is not to be compared in its evil effects to the sin against the brain by too much promiscuous reading. I protest against the "cramming" processes we have in our public schools. I protest against the "cramming" processes we have in our colleges. I protest against the lightning rapidity with which men and women gallop through their books in an evening's reading. Buy fewer books. Master those books. Read them over and over again, and make them integral parts of yourselves. The discordant voices around the Tower of Babel could not have been more helpless to do good than are the babbling tongues of many books, which have been hastily read. Better, far better, master a few great books, than have a mere speaking acquaintance with a thousand different books.

Myriads of books are coming forth with outstretched hands claiming our welcome. We can only afford to take a few to our hearts. How important, therefore, it is for us not to invite into our sanctuary a bad book. How important it is for us not to let our children read any bad books. And, above all, how important it is to have any bad books at all upon our library shelves or our sitting-room table. But though all of us are very careful never to have a bottle of arsenic or strychnine or laudanum or carbolic acid in our medicine closet unless it is conspicuously and clearly labeled "poison," yet many will allow the most deadly of all mental moral and spiritual poisons to come into our homes, in the shape of a bad book, unlabeled with any danger signal. We will suffer the evil virus of that poisonous book not only to be inoculated into our own hearts, but also into the hearts of our loved ones.

How many men have been ruined for time and eternity by the influence of one bad book! Am I describing the experience of any of you, when I imagine a scene of demoniac siege and conquest? For many years Satan was trying to batter down the doors of your father's Christian home. Again and again he had charged upon that carefully guarded stronghold to capture your heart, but again and again he had failed. Satan would come up to that front door and he would hear the family singing at evening and morning prayers, and he could not get in. He tried to entice you away from the strait path of virtue, but your Christian parents had surrounded you with so many pious influences, that he could not break them down.

Bad Books in the Home

At last Satan became completely discouraged. He called a council of war of all his fiends, to plan for your destruction. Plot after plot was gone over and pushed aside as useless. But just as the Satanic demon were about to scatter in utter dismay, an arch-fiend spoke up and said, "Let me try a flank movement on that home. Instead of sending any more of our stalwart emissaries of flesh and blood to that Christian household, let me write a bad book and slip it in through the crack of the open door into that young man's hands. In that bad book I will open that young man's eyes to the pleasures of sin. I will excite all his evil passions. Before that young man's eyes, I will halo sin in as fascinating language as Lord Byron ever did in his autobiography of Don Juan. In that book, through a garden of fragrant roses, I will lead that young man up to the very gates of hell. I will make him think he is approaching the gates of heaven. Then, just at the right moment, we will give him a shove and push him into the flames of the bottomless pit." "Aha!" cried the demons, exultingly. "Aha! we will capture that young man through the influence of a bad book." Oh, man, am I going beyond the truth when I state that your eyes were first opened to the sins of this world through the influence of a bad book? And am I going beyond my right when I state that one of the reasons, and the chief one, that you are not what you ought to be in Christian character, is because every little while you allow yourself to revel in scenes of wickedness and riot conjured up by the imagination of some licentious author? There you associate with character of that writer's creation, so vile, that you would shrink from contact with them if you were introduced to them in the flesh; but you are fascinated by the glamor with which they are clothed in his pages.

Books that Corrupt Boys

But the fiendish heart of a bad book is not satisfied with slaying one member of a family. Like the fatal coils of the serpent of a Laocoon, it would crush out the life of a father and the lives of his children also. Oh man, your spiritual life may be poisoned by bad books. Have you ever stopped to think that your children's spiritual lives may be in the process of being poisoned by the same deadly fangs? What is your boy doing in the next room? "He is reading," is your answer. What is he reading? Where did he get that book? "Oh," you answer, "I do not know, I let my boy select his own literature to read. I believe he said he borrowed that book from one of his companions." Do you not know what your boy is reading? After your own awful experience, many years

Should the Russian fleet attempt to leave the Black Sea without the consent of Turkey, it might succeed in passing the fortifications at the northern entrance of the Bosphorus; it might even continue its way down to the Golden Horn, but there would not be much hope of passing this point unscathed, and the consequences that would follow a return fire from the ships, might mean devastation and ruin to many of the most ancient, stately and beautiful structures ever reared by the hand of man.

The Palace Tcheragen, built upon the very edge of the waters of the Bosphorus, is a magnificent building of Italian marble. The present Sultan, Abdul Hamed, does not spend much of his time here, but lives the most of the year in another palace, about a mile back from the water. This home of splendour is called Yeldey Palace; it is set upon a hill, and all that magnificence can lend, is employed in the making of this home of Oriental pomp and brilliancy. In the Palace Tcheragen, Sultan Murad, brother of the present ruler, was imprisoned for twenty-five years, after a brief reign of three months. He was adjudged insane, and confined in a part of the palace from which he never emerged alive. In the illustration entitled, "View of the Golden Horn From Galata," can be seen, to the left, a tall, white tower. This is a very high minaret, built upon one of the seven hills. It is called Yangen Keoshki (meaning Tower of Fire). Here, high up near the top of the minaret, a never-ending watch is kept night and day; tireless eyes scan the city with powerful glasses, which sweep from the Black Sea on the north, to the Sea of Marmora on the south. If any sign of a conflagration is discovered, huge lanterns are hung from the outstretched arms of the tower, and simultaneously with this signal, other watchmen set in motion down in the Tophani (meaning place of guns) or arsenal, an alarm of seven guns, which arouse the firemen. Fires, however, are not of frequent occurrence, and, as most of the buildings being low, are easily controlled.

The most magnificent religious edifice in Constantinople is the Mosque of Solyman, called by the Turks, Suleimanie.

THE MAGNIFICENT TCHERAGEN PALACE, ON THE BOSPHORUS

This temple was erected by "Solyman the Magnificent," and the windows of painted glass, said to be unequalled in the world, were wrested by him from the Persians. As the light comes through these windows in beautifully blended rays on the marble walls, the effect is strikingly impressive. There are rare relics from a pagan temple, in the shape of four porphyry columns, at the angles of the building. These pillars are most exquisite in symmetry and finish, and are the boast of Suleimanie. Hanging arches of Arabian architecture relieve the base of the dome, and the cornice of the platform on which the muezzin performs his prostrations, is finely chiselled to represent a wreath of lotus leaves. The pulpit has the form of a gigantic blossom of the arum, and being wrought of fine white marble, it resembles a gigantic petrified flower. The entrance gates are thickly inlaid with mother-of-pearl, and the marble floor is strewn with the richest of carpets. But there is another feature connected with Suleimanie which is of peculiar interest and more worthy of record than any description of its magnificence.

A richly wrought gallery is heaped with chests, of all sizes and descriptions, from the rude trunk of cypress wood, the treasure box of some petty trader, to the iron-clamped strong box of some exiled noble, or wealthy merchant.

Hieroglyphics, known only to the owner, mark these boxes, piled almost to the roof, they having been previously described and registered by the authorities, and here intact they will remain, whatever time may elapse or changes come, until the proper owners claim their own. It is said that there is an immense amount of gold, silver, jewels and rich fabrics hidden in these various receptacles, and that some of these chests have occupied their places in the gallery for a century or more.

The trust is sacred and respected, and men of any nation or creed are free to deposit their property within these sacred walls, secure of its restoration when claimed.

ago, in reading a bad book, from the evil effects of which I hope you may have recovered, are you going to let your boy continue to read that book? Would, you if you could prevent it, allow your boy to go with evil companions? Would you knowingly allow him, at his tender age, to wander down into the vile haunts and look upon the immoral cesspools of our great cities? You are doing something as bad as that. Oh father, you are allowing an unprincipled author to show your boy sin in its most attractive form. Can you not see there is something wrong in your boy's book? Look at his glassy eye and flushed cheek and labored breathing. There are seeds of infamy being sown now in that young man's heart, which, if not stamped out at once, may grow up into a harvest of tares, which Satan and his demoniac hirelings alone will gather. Oh, God help us to come to the firm, Christian decision of never intentionally reading a bad book, nor of allowing a bad book to be placed in the hands of our loved ones.

I do not mean by this that the books we admit to our hearts and homes must be limited to distinctively religious books. We must read for instruction and for entertainment. Because a book is not distinctly a religious book, that is no reason why, necessarily it should be debarred from coming to our reading chairs. Some books we should select because they are books of travel. Some because they are the biographies of men and women who were the great leaders and makers of the world's history. The higher the mountain peak upon which you stand, the wider the range of your horizon. We should select some books because they teach us the geographical and geological, or astronomical, or atmospheric, or biological construction of the animal, vegetable, or mineral kingdoms, whether these studies be inside of the world, or above the world, or upon the surface of the world. "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that in them is." It is our duty to learn as much as possible about God's creations, if we can do so without curtailing the work for which God created us. But though we should select books of travel and of fiction, if the right kind of fiction, we should also select certain books as life-time companions, because first and last and intrinsically, they were written to teach us the duties of the spiritual life. We should read them, because they were written to teach us how to love the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and mind and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves.

"Limit my reading to books written for spiritual edification." Says some one: "That is unreasonable. You would not turn the home sitting-room at night into the class-room of a theological professor. You would not tell the whole human race to study theology as if they were young men studying for the ministry. Why should a layman read such books as Cotton Mather's Essay on Doing Good, or Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, or Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, or Thomas A. Kempis' Meditations, or Richard Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest? The only rest I could get from reading such books as those would be to go sound asleep over them. I might, perhaps, stay awake for a little while in reading some of the light religious books, like Elizabeth Stewart Phelps' Gates Ajar, or Elizabeth Payson's Stepping Heavenward; but it would not be for long. No, I never did like religious books. When I read, I read for fun and for mental improvement. You must not expect laymen, and especially young people, to read the same books as do the ministers."

Not expect laymen to read the same kind of literature as ministers? No. But I would have laymen use common sense in their selections of books. I would have them treat the brain in reference to its mental food, on the same principle as we would treat the physical body. You restrict your stomach to one kind of diet long enough, and you will starve your physical body to death, no matter what kind of food you may take. "What did your husband die of?" I asked a lady some time ago. "From starvation," she answered. "He had an incurable disease, but that disease did not directly kill him. We could only feed him on beefsteak and toast. We bought him the very best steak in the market, but beefsteak has not all the ingredients in it to support life, and so he gradually starved and passed away." Are you going to restrict your mind and soul to only one kind of mental food? If you are a broker, is the full extent of your reading to be found in perusing the columns of stock markets in the morning newspapers? If you are a lawyer, are you only going to read about the forensic giants of the past, who won their memorable victories at the bar, or spend most of your time in studying your new cases? If you are a tired mother, when night comes and all the children are in bed, are you going to simply while away your evening hours reading a novel and crying over some princess who never lived? With what books are you feeding your soul? I am not talking about the Bible now! What other books are you reading that are deepening and widening your intellectual and spiritual life? Are you reading any such books at all?

But if it is necessary for us to read spiritual books for mental food, how much more necessary is it, that we, as Christian students, should read and love that greatest of all books which God has given to us to be our guide. We have read how the great masters of literature loved their books. Doctor Geikie tells us that "when Henry Thomas Buckle, the distinguished historian was dying, his last words on earth were, 'My poor books! my poor books!'" When Leibnitz died, he died with one of his precious books in his hand. When death came to call Robert Southey, he found him an old, white-haired man, kissing and stroking the books he was too weak to open, and too blind to read. Cicero's greatest desire on earth was expressed in the words: "Oh, take all that I have, but leave me my books." Could there be a better picture than that which Cunningham Geikie drew, of the love which these masters in literature bore their books? Should that love be greater than the love Christians ought to bear the Book of books, which God gave to us to show us the way of life? If spiritual books are essential for our mental food, should we not feed upon this Book which is wholly divine?

I want you to class books among the best of friends and the worst of enemies. As Loyola, the wounded soldier of Fortune, became Loyola, the soldier of Christ, by reading The Lives of the Saints, so I want the good books to lift you and purify you and make you a Gospel messenger among men. As bad books are the worst enemies of mankind, I want to enlist your help in fighting them at every step. "If ever the devil had an agent on earth, I have been one," spake the dying author of a pernicious book. "Oh, that I could destroy that book." I want you to fight these evil books wherever you go. I want you to see that your library shelves are cleared of the "lepers." I want you to see that your children never are allowed to touch a bad book. And furthermore, I want you, by the help of God, to scatter forth the copies of that one Book, which shall yet trample over all evil books, because it is the "Sword of the Spirit," which shall never fail.

May God teach us one and all, to pillow our heads upon the promises and live as Christ would have us live, because we love the "Old Book."

If thou art merry, here are airs:
If melancholy, here are prayers:
If studious, here are those things writ
Which may deserve thy ablest wit;
If hungry, here is food divine,
If thirsty, nectar, heavenly wine.

Read then; but first thyself prepare;
To read with zeal and mark with care;
And when thou readest what here is writ,
Let thy best practice second it;
So twice each precept shall be,
First in the Book and next in thee.

The American Farmer in Cuba

A FARM SCENE IN CUBA

IN the picturesque station of Cristina, Havana, are gathered together a motley array of passengers, waiting for the train of the Ferro-Carril-Del-Oeste (Western Railway), which leaves every morning at seven for Pinar del Rio. Whites, negroes, mulattoes, Chinamen, and a goodly sprinkling of Americans. There are first and second-class cars—about the only difference being that the former have cane seats, and the latter wooden benches—but as the cost is about half for second class, many Americans starting out to “farm it” in Cuba, and not being over-supplied with funds, wisely determine to economize from the start, and take the cheaper car.

Leaving Havana and its suburbs behind, we pass many pine-apple plantations, and a few sugar estates, with their avenues of stately palms, and handsome residences showing through the foliage, interspersed with fields of grazing cattle; but upon entering the Province of Pinar del Rio the scene changes. This is called “The Garden of Cuba,” and truly it deserves the name. Now we pass through fields of waving sugar-cane, the tall chimneys of the sugar-houses looming up among them, until at last we enter upon the vueltaabajo, the tobacco district. Here we see the regas of rich tobacco, fresh and green, growing often under groves of banana trees, with the bohio (hut) of the farmer in the midst.

Artemisa at last! The promised land of the American settling in Cuba. Only two hours from Havana, and land of all kinds, suitable for every purpose. Would you raise tobacco, or vegetables and fruits? there is the rich red or black soil; if you desire pasturage, like the “Merrie hills of England,” those fields are waving far and wide. A peculiarity often met with in Cuban soil, is to encounter two totally distinct classes of soil in close juxtaposition.

Here is Luis from the Potrero to meet us, mounted on a bicycle (much in use down there on account of the good roads), also a wagon, mule and driver, to carry us to the farm—some miles from the station—as well as an ox-cart to take our furniture, which we have brought with us, even to the family cat; and pussy enjoys as much as we, the ride along the beautiful Calzada or king’s highway, as smooth as a floor. Here and there is an Obras-Publicas, or Public Works of the Government, where are manufactured all the tools and materials necessary for making and repairing the roads, bridges, etc. Here lives the overseer, who has charge of all the peons or road-makers, each of whom has also his neat little house at certain distances, has full charge of, and constantly works at his share of the road.

We are at last at our new home, the building of which one of our party has been overseeing for several weeks in advance of us. It is only a four-room frame structure, with piazza, lifted above the ground on stilts, as it were. This piazza we shall enclose with the cloth mosquito netting we have brought with us, and hope by so doing, those pests and flies will leave us alone, but alas! the flea, as well as a small gnat, is at times more troublesome than the mosquitoes. However, if you come to a tropical country, inconveniences should be met with a cheerful, even stoical spirit. The unplastered walls we paper with some pretty pieces we have in our trunks, and with all the home photographs and pictures we are even elegant. We have brought a small cook-stove, and with plenty of wood on the place, our supply of fuel is assured. These parelejo trees, by the way, make the finest kind of charcoal (the fuel of the island), it being burned exclusively in the cities in a table-like arrangement, fitted with pots underneath for burning the charcoal, with a smoke-hood overhead. In the country bohios, they construct a box upon a table, fill it with sand, and over this suspend a couple of iron rods, and underneath on the sand make a fire of wood. The Dutch oven is generally used for baking. The fires of the charcoal-burners are to be seen at night in all directions, as well as the flames from the burning grass, as the pasturage, when it becomes dry, has to be renewed in this manner. Before the war, this province was filled with peaceful cattle, grazing “on a thousand hills,” but the war devastated all this, and it will take a number of years before they can be replaced. Meanwhile the profits of cattle-raising are reasonably assured.

OUR “LIVING HOUSE” ON THE AMERICAN FARM IN CUBA

While waiting for our cattle to increase, we shall engage in several side ventures. We have started a grove of young banana trees, which will not only produce a profitable crop, but at the same time give us a necessary shade around the house. This province was almost devastated of fruits also during the war, and they are quite scarce. Several American fruit companies have been formed which will soon remedy this defect. Planting the posturas, or young seedlings, for the regas of tobacco is a profitable business, and only require about two months’ work, beginning early in September. Tomatoes are being largely shipped from Havana in the cold winter months, when they bring high price as well as egg-plants. Both of these we tested on the farm, and found they grew readily, and gave good stock plants with fine fruit. All this largely in the nature of experimenting. Another year we shall put in a wine mill, and be prepared to overcome obstacles.

With New York clamoring for fresh fruits and vegetables all winter, Florida, with its frequent frosts an discouragements unable to supply the demand—and so what you will of the beautiful fruits of California, which are tasteless—there is no reason why an American starting out to “farm it” in Cuba, should not make a success of it; but—and here is a large but—he should have sufficient capital to subsist for one or possibly two years without returns, as he will find that his profits (if any) must go back on the land, and he may meet with discouragements and trials, which, if manfully met and stubbornly resisted, will give success in the end.

Near by the farm is a beautiful lake set amongst the hills with lofty palms in the background, and on its banks a fine old deserted mansion, desecrated and destroyed during the reign of terror. Here rampant weeds, where once pattered merry little feet, while lizards and all creeping things seem to be the only inhabitants of this roofless ruin. Standing here, and looking down upon the peaceful valley and lake below, one muses upon the fate of the unhappy beings, driven from this earthly paradise to become reconcentrados, and their worldly goods destroyed, and their wealth in cattle confiscated. Sad are the tales the people tell of those awful times. Cuba, as by fire purified, is arising out of her dust and ashes—nay, has arisen—and is stretching forth hand across the sea to welcome the new interloper, who come not as of old with fire and sword, to desolate and make waste, but equipped with the plough and harrow, to till the soil, to set Esau free from his bondage, and to make beautiful the waste and ravages of war; yea, to “make the wilderness blossom forth as a rose!” All hail to the American Farmer in Cuba! ELLA GODINEZ.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

F. O., Athens, Tex. “I am sure we should, for faltering ones, acknowledge God’s answers to our prayers. He has answered many direct for me.”

A Friend. “I know, from personal experience, that God will answer our prayers, if only we have faith, and I wish to add my testimony to those of many others who can tell of his great goodness. I wish I could make others feel and understand what He is to me.”

M. A., West Virginia. “God has heard and answered my prayers, and in many ways. Because He hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon Him as long as I live.”

Mary A. M. “I feel that I must acknowledge the goodness and mercy of the dear Lord for helping me out of what seemed a great trouble. I could not rest day or night on account of it. Then I prayed to the Lord, and He has delivered me. He says in his Word, ‘Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee.’ I want to tell the readers of your good paper that I have proved his words, and they are truth.”

M. W. W., California. “The Bible says, ‘The Lord’s ears are open to the cries of his children.’ I firmly believe what our Lord says. I was in great bodily affliction. I cried unto the Lord for relief, and he sent a total stranger to me with a specific, which relieved me almost instantly. I Peter 3:12, says, ‘The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and His ears are open unto their prayers.’ He does hear and answer prayer.”

M. A. M., Colo. “‘Answered Prayers’ have been a great help to me. I promised my dear Father, if he would remove a great burden from my heart that I would acknowledge it to the whole world. In his infinite love he has removed that burden, now my heart is full of praise to him.”

“There is a peace that cometh after sorrow. Of hope surrendered, not of hope fulfilled: A peace that looketh not upon to-morrow, But calmly on a tempest that is stilled.”

C. M. S., Vermont. “I have been trusting in the Lord forty years and more, and have taken numerous trials to him, and he has answered in his own good time and way, for which I praise his holy name. I am still trusting him to help me through a great trial, believing that he knows what is for the best good of his children, and will help all those that believe and trust his promises.”

Mrs. B. K. “Lately we have had a very remarkable answer to prayer. We thought our little son would lose his eyesight, and we prayed night and day for the dear Lord to spare the sight of one eye if he couldn’t have both (for the one we are certain was gone), but thanks be to God in his wonderful mercy he spared the sight of one entirely, and we think the other also. Have faith, dear friends, for the dear Lord answered a prayer that seemed almost impossible to us. He will answer others. We will praise him as long as we live.”

M. K. F. “I was in trouble and did not see any way out. I took it to the Lord in prayer, and blessed be his Holy Name, the next day he answered in his own way, which is always best. Every time that I go to God with anything, however small it may seem, he answers and brings peace and joy to my heart. I will ever trust him.”

L. G. M., New York. “I promised God if he would let me live through an operation I would publish it. He let me live and my health is much benefited. I have had many answers to prayers.”

E. W. L., Ohio. “Please print in your list of ‘Answered Prayers,’ my grateful acknowledgment to God for his loving kindness in wonderful answers to my petitions. Our loving Father never forgets those who put their trust in Him. The way may seem dark, but the light will shine soon or later. ‘His ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, nor his arm shortened that it cannot save.’”

M. T., Que. “I do believe that God answers prayer. About a year ago a trouble threatened us. I took it to God in prayer promising him that if he would answer, I would acknowledge it. He heard and answered, and may he forgive me for delaying so long in acknowledging it.”

One of the Least. “I have always found great peace and comfort and spiritual strength in prayer, and I have received many gracious answers. A friend in whose spiritual welfare I was deeply interested, became offended at a reproof I gave. I prayed that the Holy Spirit might at once reveal to the offended person his own error and remove all resentment. Two days later I received a letter beginning, ‘Powerfully moved by the Holy Spirit I send this,’ and after confession and apology, explanation followed that his heart was melted, and he realized that the Spirit was moving him to write to me as he at once did. The letter was written and posted within two hours after the prayer was uttered. ‘While they are yet speaking, I will hear’ (Isa. 65: 24). Blessed be his name.”

A Whole City Under Gospel Fire

THE value of the Simultaneous Meeting idea in evangelistic work has again been demonstrated in a notable campaign at Binghamton, N. Y. This is a city of 45,000 inhabitants. For nearly three weeks Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and nine co-workers labored in five different sections of the city in simultaneous services, arranged to reach all classes and conditions of people. Dr. Chapman, assisted by Mr. Fred Butler as soloist, and Mr. Harper G. Smyth as chorus-leader, was in the western section of the city, where nine churches were united.

In the central, or downtown district, three large churches were united under the leadership of Rev. Dr. Henry Ostrom, assisted by Mr. John P. Hillis as soloist and song leader. Dr. Ostrom's preaching fairly captivated the masses, and he showed himself resourceful in evangelistic methods.

In the north section of the city, four churches were joined in the campaign, directed by Rev. Dr. R. A. Walton, with Mr. O. F. Pugh in charge of the music. On the south side, four churches were led by Rev. Dr. D. S. Toy, with Mr. Frank Dickson as song leader. At the east end, three churches had services in charge of Rev. C. T. Schaeffer, the Children's Evangelist, for the first week, and Rev. Dr. L. M. S. Haynes, assisted by Prof. W. S. Weeden, during the remainder of the campaign. Rev. Mr. Schaeffer held two series of Children's Meetings during the course of the campaign. Noon meetings were held each day in the Court-room of the Court House; and on the last day of the series, a Day of Prayer was observed, with service beginning at 9 A.M., and lasting almost continuously. In the afternoon, nearly all the places of business in the city, including saloons and barber-shops, closed their doors to give every one an opportunity to join in the worship.

The preaching of Dr. Chapman and his co-workers has been searching, practical, unemotional, and withal intensely earnest. On one Sunday afternoon, Dr. Chapman spoke "to men only" in the Opera House.

A GROUP OF THE WORKERS IN THE "SIMULTANEOUS MOVEMENT" AT BINGHAMTON

The building was packed. More than one hundred cards went into the hands of the pastors. On the following Sunday, Dr. Ostrom spoke in the same place, before what was probably the largest non-church going audience of this remarkable Gospel campaign.

noon hour, with very telling results.

While the figures have not been officially stated, it is generally understood that upwards of 2,000 cards were signed during the meetings.

Delighted with the Encyclopedia

You invited me to express my mind in words about the Crown Encyclopedia and Dictionary, which I received Monday of this week. When I received the Encyclopedia my husband said he would not take $25 for it, so you see how much he prized it. The boy in my class who would give the best history of Joseph in his own language should have a present. I sent for the Encyclopedia. I had to give it to my husband and satisfy the boy with something else; but the boy was at my house Thanksgiving, and he was reading my books, when his father missed him at family worship. I think the most of them, for the price, of any books I ever had; they are all much better than I expected.

CHRISTMAS CHIMES

RINGING, swinging, light as air,
Sweet songs of long-lost years.
Swaying, playing everywhere,
In time with falling tears.

Throbbing, sobbing, sweet refrain,
We list to catch the tone.
Lowly, slowly, floats the strain,
A wavering, trembling moan.

Sighing, dying, Life is past.
Silent, dark-winged Death,
Kneeling, stealing, quick and fast,
The music's ebbing breath.

Tolling, rolling, on our hearts,
The stone that shuts the tomb.
Fearing, hearing, naught that starts,
A hope to break the gloom.

Till loudly, proudly, rings the sound,
From Bethlehem's plains afar,
While lightly, brightly, all around,
Love shines from Bethlehem's star.

A Great Canadian Divine Dead

ON December 1 there passed away in Toronto, the Rev. Principal Caven, D.D., of Knox College, one of Canada's greatest divines. Born in Scotland, December 26, 1830, Dr. Caven came to Canada when seventeen years of age, and soon after entered upon the study of theology. In 1852 he was ordained, and became minister at St. Mary's, Ontario, where he continued for fourteen years, when he was called to be a professor in Knox College, Toronto, and to the principalship seven or eight years later. During his thirty-eight years' service at the college more than six hundred students have passed through his hands. The influence which this great and good man left on these young men can never be measured. The devotion of the graduates to their honored teacher has long been proverbial. Cautious, wise, sympathetic, as well as scholarly and inspiring, he left an impression never to be removed.

Outside of college halls Dr. Caven's influence was equally marked. The part which he took in the union of the different Presbyterian bodies received fitting recognition in his Moderatorship of the First General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. The high office of Moderator of Pan-Presbyterian Council was also his at the last meeting of that international body, so that no minister of the church throughout the world has been more honored by his brethren than Dr. Caven. Many other high offices have also been in his keeping. At the time of his death he was President of the Ontario Lord's Day Alliance, and his last public platform appearance, a few days before his death, was in the city of Guelph, in the interest of that organization and the Canadian Sabbath. "A Lost Plea," also only a few days old, came from his pen through the Toronto Globe for the abolition of the barroom. In all good works he will be missed, and in none more keenly than in the present movement for the union of Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists, in which he was a guiding spirit.

IMMANUEL

GOD with us! Proclaim the story,
Kneeling at the Manger-Shrine;
On our low estate, his Glory
Sheds a lustre all divine.

Little did the great world heed Him
On that morning when He came;
Only simple hearts that need Him
Yet are swift to own his name.

First of all in adoration,
Of the little Holy Child,
Born to bring our earth Salvation,
Bent his mother, fair and mild.

'Twas a virgin mother bore Him,
Chosen of all maids, was she;
In the meekest faith before Him
Bent her sweet humanity.

Child of Heaven! Through waiting ages
Hearts devout had yearned for him:
Shepherd folk and Eastern sages
Knelt within the stable dim.

Flamed the radiant Star above him;
Sang the angels, loud and clear;
So we sing to-day, who love him:
Christ hath brought Salvation here!

God with us! Proclaim the story;
Worship we the Babe divine,
Bow before Immanuel's glory—
Worship at the Manger-Shrine!

The Sad Side of Life

AN acknowledged authority on sociological questions, Mr. Robert Hunter, whose experience in Settlement work has brought him much into contact with the poor in our great cities, has lately given to the world some startling figures. He asserts that ten millions of men, women and children in the United States, are at the present moment in actual want, and suffering from the lack of sufficient food and clothing. He also declares that New York has the largest proportion of poor of any great city in the world, and that fifty thousand children go daily to school hungry.

These are appalling figures. If they were simply the deductions of a student of sociological conditions, however slimly supported, they would still be sufficiently startling; but there are correlative facts at hand that are strongly in line with Mr. Hunter's assertions. Mr. Wm. C. York, Superintendent of the Municipal Lodging-House (a city benevolence), has declared that the Metropolis this winter is facing a problem with regard to the unemployed, such as has never been known in past years. "There are at least forty per cent more idle men in the city this year," he says, "than at the same time a year ago." He adds that the present month "will break all previous records." So overwhelmed is the Department of Public Charities and Corrections with applications from men out of work, that it finds itself utterly unable to cope with the situation. These applications run into the tens of thousands. It may interest some to know that ninety per cent. of these sufferers are men; but it should not be forgotten that a very large proportion of them have wives and children, who stay at home (if they still have a home), while the husband and father goes to the front to fight the grim battle with hunger, in their behalf. Who can tell of the pitiful tragedies that are the issue of that hopeless and unequal conflict?

It is useless to speculate concerning the causes that have brought about this condition of affairs. Whether it be unrestricted immigration from abroad, as many of the men themselves declare, or an abnormal influx from the rural districts to the city, is of less moment now than the immediate problem of how to deal with these multitudes of unemployed. It is doubtless true that thousands of them have been attracted hither from the country by false expectations of getting work at good wages. Any plan by which these men could be returned to their homes would be a welcome boon to themselves, and would greatly assist in relieving the situation besides. Many of them have given up other work to come here, and now they are stranded and penniless. They would joyfully welcome any reasonable offer of employment out of the city. We believe they would render good and faithful service. They are honest toilers—not loafers or criminals. They are not broken down by dissipation and evil companions. Their present condition is not their fault but their misfortune.

If any employer of labor in a nearby State, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, or Connecticut, or in the State of New York outside of the city, who is in need of help, will write to the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau, 55 Bowery, he will learn how he may engage, free of all fees and cost of transportation, strong, able-bodied, respectable men, who will render good service for living wages. Let our readers and their friends think over this opportunity and give the experiment a trial. By so doing, they will not only be helping themselves, but rendering a great service to those who stand in most urgent need of help at the present time.

Domestic Service an Honorable Occupation

FAR be it from any sensible woman in this enlightened day to regard domestic service as anything but honorable. The foolish people who consider themselves lowered by it are to be found chiefly among girls and young women, who deliberately choose harder work and longer hours elsewhere because they fancy there is a stigma upon household labor. Our blessed Saviour put the greatest honor upon lowly service, when he said: "I am among you as he that serveth." In reality, no class of wage-earners to-day is half so independent as the wage-earners in the home, and no others are so generously paid for their work. The wages of cooks and housemaids are much larger than the salaries of women-clerks and dressmakers, and as board and lodging is included, they have every opportunity to make a good provision for their old age, and in fact, if the savings' banks should tell their story, it would be seen that many of the largest depositors are domestic servants. At present there is an increasing tendency on the part of employers to multiply the privileges of their maids, and to relax rules that have perhaps been too stringent, in regard to their going out when their work is done. Improvement all round is the order of the day.

CHRISTIANS seeking a good motto for the new year may be commended to the topic the Christian Endeavor Society has chosen for the week beginning January 1. It is that thrilling passage in the epistle to the Philippians (3: 12-16), in which Paul takes his readers into his confidence, and tells them his own estimate of his position, and the aim of his life. The passage is worth analysis, coming as it did from an aged man who had been a strenuous worker for Christ.

It is remarkable that a man who had so unbounded a dependence on divine grace and so clear an idea of all that God could do for those who were trusting in Him, should have laid so much emphasis on human effort. His language is positively tense with the struggle he is making. It ought to teach us the necessity for earnest and unintermitting striving. We ask God to help us in our endeavor to reach higher attainment, and we do right, for without his aid we can do nothing; but we sometimes forget that there is a work that we also have to do. We must co-operate in our own development. As the boy at school must himself study, otherwise the best teachers can do nothing for him, so the Christian must not expect to become perfect without effort of his own. He must be vigilant over his faults; watchful against temptation; forever striving to become more like Christ. To a man thus minded God gives more grace and more strength to enable him to reach the goal. To the man who sits down at the foot of the mountain and prays to be raised to the summit, there comes no answer; but he who, having prayed for help, sets out to climb, finds strength given to him that is not his own.

Another lesson that we may learn from the passage, is the folly of relying on past experience. Some people are continually recalling the time of their conversion, and drawing comfort, or the reverse, from the anxieties and joys that they had when they were inquiring their way to Christ. All that the apostle puts away from him. He is so intent on attaining perfection, that he does not revert to the commencement of his Christian life. Conversion is the beginning, when a man is turned around and his face set in a new direction. It is not a certificate with which a man is to be content without further progress.

We ought never to be satisfied with our attainments. If the apostle was not content, surely we ought always to be reaching after something higher. They who study the life of Christ, who try to obey his commandments, always realize their own shortcoming, and lament the imperfection of their own life. To be free from sin in thought, in word and in deed, is but the negative side of life, and yet how difficult that is. To be making attainments on the positive side, learning meekness, gentleness, Christlikeness is far higher. The Christian's career is an absorbing business, one that may well engross a man's highest and most strenuous effort. And it pays. There is no earthly object that compares with it—neither wealth nor fame nor power—because it is work for eternity.

Christian Socialism

A GOOD many good people are disturbed at the sound of the word "Socialism," confounding it in many instances with un-Christian theories of government. I have had many letters from intelligent people asking if "socialism" and "anarchy" were not the same thing, confounding the word not only with "anarchy," but with "communism," and other words which were the direct opposite of socialism.

The definition given to "socialism" by the Century Dictionary is: "Any theory or system of social organization which would abolish entirely, or in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it co-operative action, would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor, and would make land and capital as the instruments and means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community." John Stuart Mill says: "Socialism by no means excludes private ownership of articles of consumption."

The term "Christian Socialism" has been used for many years, especially in England, by Charles Kingsley, Frederick D. Maurice, Thomas Hughes and others. There need be no fear concerning the use of the word "Socialism," when the word "Christian" is put in front of it. In the story, "The Heart of the World," which is appearing in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I define what I understand is the meaning of the term, "Christian Socialism," by means of the lecture given by Fredrick Stanton, in which he goes into detail concerning the use of the term and its meaning. In this brief article, I do not think it is necessary to attempt to anticipate the explanation which will be given in the story itself, but, in brief, as I understand it, the term "Christian Socialism" would mean the application of the teachings of Jesus to the commercial and mercantile life of the world, so that the life of communities and nations would be based upon a genuine brotherhood. The difficulty of explaining what this would mean in detail in a brief article like this, is apparent to anyone, and I would ask the readers of the story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be patient enough to let the story itself unfold the meaning of the term.

It is my profound conviction that Christian people, who are desirous of seeing the Kingdom of God established in the every-day life of men, need have no fear concerning the logic of Christian teaching, as applied to the commerce of men. If love rules in the heart of men in business, as it should, the details which are necessary in the making of a nation will take care of themselves. No theory of human government is good for anything in the long run, which excludes this one necessary element of love of man to man, and on the love of men to men and men to God rests the entire structure of what I understand to be "Christian Socialism."

Fanny Crosby Well

Fanny Crosby denies her connection with any book, purporting to be published and sold with a view to raising money enough to purchase for her a house. She writes that she is in her usual health, and has a comfortable home. Inquiries concerning Fanny Crosby may be addressed to her staunch friends, Biglow and Main, 135 Fifth Avenue, New York City, with whom, for forty years, she has sustained, uninterruptedly, most pleasant business relations.

The President's Message

UNDER the circumstances evolved by the recent election, by which the Republican Party secured a working majority in both Houses of Congress, the President's Message was anticipated with keen interest, as it was realized that it would embody the national policy of the ensuing four years. While the House was opposed to the Presidential policy it might thwart his wishes, but with both branches agreeing with him in general principles, it was realized that his recommendations would have a fair prospect of being accepted and embodied in legislation. The Message consequently has more than ordinary claims on public interest.

Mr. Roosevelt's first word is a caution against wastefulness and extravagance. While recognizing the need of spending more money as the nation develops, and gratefully acknowledging the continuance of prosperity which enables us to spend it, he warns Congress against the temptation, always present when there is a large surplus, to carelessness and the relaxation of careful scrutiny in appropriations. He then proceeds to discuss the question of capital and labor. He says: "More important than any legislation is the gradual growth of a feeling of responsibility and forbearance among capitalists and wage-earners alike." He believes in organized labor, and thinks that all encouragement should be given to the Unions, "as long as they are conducted with a decent regard to the rights of others;" but he would oppose wrong-doing by a Union as resolutely as he would wrong-doing by a corporation. He recommends that the Labor Bureau should investigate and report on the conditions of labor in the various States, not only in the matter of wages, but as to the hours and the conditions of labor among women and children, and to the effect of immigration on the labor market. As to the Trusts, the President believes them to be necessary, but contends that the power to deal with them should rest with Congress, not with the various States. He advocates an extension of the work already begun for the reclamation of the arid lands of the West. The present law "has been found to be remarkably complete and effective, and so broad in its provisions that a wide range of undertakings has been possible under it. At the same time, economy is guaranteed by the fact that the funds must ultimately be returned to be used over again." An important recommendation is that made by the President that an appropriation be made for a commission to study the industrial and commercial conditions of Oriental lands, especially of China, in the interest of the extension of American trade.

On our foreign policy, the President maintains the attitude so sharply criticised during the recent campaign that it is the duty of America to be ready to exercise international police power on this side of the globe. "Chronic wrong-doing, or an impotence which results in a general loosening of the ties of civilized society, may in America, as elsewhere, ultimately require intervention by some civilized nation, and in the Western Hemisphere the adherence of the United States to the Monroe Doctrine may force the United States, however reluctantly, in flagrant cases of such wrong-doing or impotence, to the exercise of an international police power." He therefore earnestly recommends "that there be no halt in the work of upbuilding the American Navy." There are also duties in regard to other nations, which, as a great Power, we must fulfil. "In taking," he says, "such steps as we have taken in regard to Cuba, Venezuela, and Panama, and in endeavoring to circumscribe the theatre of war in the Far East, and to secure the open door in China, we have acted in our own interest as well as in the interest of humanity at large. There are, however, cases in which, while our own interests are not greatly involved, strong appeal is made to our sympathies." Such cases where it is inevitable that our opinion should be emphatically expressed are those of the massacre of the Jews at Kishineff and the cruelty and oppression of which the Armenians have been the victims.

As to the fiercely debated question of the Filipinos, the President expresses the hope that "in the end they will be able to stand, if not entirely alone, yet in some such relation to the United States as Cuba now stands. This end is not yet in sight, and it may be indefinitely postponed if our people are foolish enough to turn the attention of the Filipinos away from the problems of dollar is worth less than fifty cents, so that even deducting the value of the goods purchased, a large profit is made. Thus the more money the agent spends, the more he has. Unhappily his gain is another's loss. It is not in his case, as it is with the man whose example the Bible commends, as having the same result. The gain of the philanthropist is gain, coming from the hands of God.

There is that scattereth and yet increaseth (Prov. 11:24).

The War

Japan's capture of the position known as 203-Meter Hill, has given her an advantage which she has promptly turned to account. A continuous fire has been kept up on the Russian fleet in the harbor of Port Arthur, which has resulted in the sinking of the battleship Pollava, and the Relvizan, and the burning of the Peresviet, the Pal-lada, and the Pobieda. The Sevastopol, though screened by a hill, was hit several times and badly injured.

Several gunboats have also been damaged. These, practically compose the entire Russian fleet in those waters. Besides this, the fire of the Japanese from the commanding position, prevents the Russians communicating with Liaotishan, from which promontory they were removing guns and munitions to Port Arthur. The Russians have made desperate efforts to recapture the hill. The slaughter on both sides was terrific, but the Japanese could not be driven out. Since those attempts, the Russian fire has slackened, and it is believed that their ammunition is getting low. There seems now to be a disposition on the part of the Japanese to make no assault on the city, but to attempt to starve the garrison out. A rumor now current, but not yet confirmed, is that the Czar has ordered the recall of the Baltic fleet, believing that if it approaches Port Arthur, it, too, will be destroyed by the Japanese. The Grand Dukes are said to have been opposed to this order, but the Czar took the matter into his own hands. The armies near Moukden have remained passive during the week, but a decisive battle appears to be imminent. The destruction of life has been horrible and there is still no sign of either combatant being exhausted. Both nations are learning that the warning of the ancient prophet was true:

Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war (Isa. 3: 25).

achieving moral and material prosperity, of working for a stable, orderly, and just government, and toward foolish and dangerous intrigues for a complete independence for which they are as yet totally unfit."

On the vexed questions of the Tariff and the Race Problem, the President maintains a judicious silence, doubtless hoping that the various sections of his own party may find a basis for agreement.

The President has evidently made a close study of social and political conditions, and while all may not agree in the recommendations he makes, the Christian patriot will pray that he may be endowed with divine wisdom, and helped to fulfil the Scriptural ideal of the ruler of a great nation:

That which is altogether just shalt thou follow (Deut. 16:20).

Fraudulent Funds

A method of fraudulent gain has been exposed in several Western States recently. Agents have been established in several large cities to whom quantities of Mexican dollars have been sent. These look so much like the American coin, that inexperienced employees in stores are often deceived. The agent goes to a store during the busiest part of the day and professing to be in a hurry makes a small purchase. He gives a Mexican dollar in payment and receives his change. The

A DAY'S DISCOVERY

By IRVING BACHELLER, AUTHOR OF "EBEN HOLDEN," "VERGILIUS," Etc.

MY LIFE had been full of work and worry. On leaving college I had planned to do many things that I had never done. I was to travel, I was to read and study, I was to wish and have—indeed, what was I not to do and what had I done? Nothing but drudgery, which had prospered so as to beggar me of my best hopes. The hurry and hazard of business life had never given me so much even as a day off. It had been hard on my wife, and from the first I felt sorry for her. We had no children, and in our little flat my wife insisted that a servant would be in the way. I was detained at my office frequently until neither my wife nor my dinner were at their best. I often ate with suppressed emotion those days, while she sat beside me in tears, and I could never quite understand her grieving when I had no fault to find myself.

Early or late, I had no heart for reading or going after pleasure when I got home.

Somehow the weight of the whole day seemed to fall on me of a sudden when I sat under my own roof. Generally I lay on the sofa, with my pipe and paper, while my wife put away the dishes. That done, we talked languidly about the events of the day, and were in bed by half after nine.

I loved books, and bought them freely as I prospered. "I may have a spell of sickness sometime," I used to say, "and then possibly I can read them."

I kept well, however, and busy in a steady round of toil. Other people had malaria and leisure now and then, as I read in the papers, and I regarded them with a kind of envy. Our home was in a little suburban town. We had been married about ten years, when I came home one summer evening with extraordinary news.

"Hello, Pete," said I—that is the name I called her at home—"I've got news."

"What do you mean?" she inquired.

"A vacation," I answered. "No more business for a while. Now I hope we'll have a little comfort together. I want you to join that reading club you spoke of and go and see your friends. I'll look after the flat a while myself. I can stand it for a couple of weeks, anyhow."

We sat that evening, and made plans for the near future. Next morning my wife went to town. She was to call on some of her friends and leave her measure for a new gown and do a lot of delayed shopping. I sat alone reading for a long time after she went away. There was a deadly stillness in the flat, but somehow I couldn't keep my mind to the book. I had read ten chapters, when I discovered myself groping in the gloomy labyrinths of an Egyptian tomb. How I got there was a mystery to me. I looked back through a dozen pages; it was all new. I had gone as far as the hundredth page with nothing more in my mind than I had had to start with. I had been thinking over the details of my business ever since I opened the book. Suddenly a sharp blast on the whistle of the dumb-waiter brought me to my feet. The noisy vehicle came rumbling up presently, and I took off a lot of string beans and peas and green corn and potatoes and beefsteak and butter, and a pair of ducks, and tossed them all into the refrigerator. Evidently my wife had stopped on her way and left orders for dinner.

She had told me where I would find everything I needed for luncheon. It was eleven o'clock, and, to relieve my loneliness, I went out for a long walk. I had no sooner opened the kitchen door on my return than the whistle spat at me as if I had been a dog and it a cat, and no love between us. I opened the door of the dumb-waiter, wondering why people call them dumb. That one was a perfect well of sarcasm, profanity, and servants' gossip expressed in varying languages and dialects. A woman's voice came ringing up the shaft.

"Did you take them ducks off the dumb-waiter?" it demanded.

"Guess I did," I answered. "Thought they belonged here. Hold on a minute, I'll send them down."

I rushed to the refrigerator for the ducks, and as I did so, the outline of a dialogue that was very loud and heavy on one side came echoing up the shaft. To my horror, I discovered that in tossing the ducks into the ice chamber, I had upset a bottle of ketchup and a bowl of molasses. One of them looked like a chunk of rusty iron. I gave him a bath under the hot water faucet and rubbed him dry with a Turkish towel. Then I thrust them both into a paper sack and hurled them into the dumb-waiter.

"Madame, forgive me," said I; "here they are," and then I began to pull frantically at the rope.

"That'll do," they shouted presently.

I stopped, puffing with the violence of my effort. Then a loud cry came up at me through the shaft, and the sound of angry voices.

"Please, sor," the woman called again.

"What is it, Madame?" I answered, my head in the gloom of the shaft.

"The Mrs. would like to know what ye put on thim ducks."

"Ketchup and molasses," I answered. "I'm sorry. It was an accident."

"Pon my word!" I heard her say then. "He's filled one o' thim wid molasses."

There came a sharp answer, and then the unfortunate ducks were flung back into the dumb-waiter.

"The Mrs. says ye can take the ducks an' welcome," and before I could make any answer, the door of the shaft came to with a bang, and that stratum of light in the depths below me, turned to darkness. It would have given me pleasure to buy another pair of ducks for the good woman, but she had not given me a chance to make the offer. I would have gone and rang her door-bell in an effort to make amend, but I had no idea where to find her. I ate my luncheon presently, and went to our bedroom and sat in an easy chair by the window, with my pipe. The hum of insects and the noises of the street came up to me, increasing my loneliness. I looked about the room. There were things in it I had never seen before; silken covered bottles with ribbons tied to them; a paper-holder delicately embroidered; photographs of myself in little golden frames, and others, reminding me of times and faces well nigh forgotten; a hundred trifles that, one by one, had gone unnoticed into the building of my home and happiness. I opened a bureau drawer full of plush-covered boxes, and silken belts and ribbons, and the smell of violets. In one of the boxes there were a lot of old beads and bracelets, a discarded neck-chain, and many trinkets—the delight of some far distant day. In another box there was an old photograph of me—a callow looking youth—and a bundle of letters. I untied them, and sat down comfortably to look them over. I had written a lot of high-sounding rubbish in those letters; I had made many promises; I had painted many pictures of what the future was to bring us. It had all been very different—a life full of drudgery for both, and for her it must have been a desert. I thought of the days innumerable, and full of loneliness that she had spent in that gloomy flat; of the sneering volubility of the dumb-waiter. I put away the letters and entered the sitting room. It was two o'clock, and I took a book from its shelf and lay down upon the sofa in a vain pursuit of knowledge. This time I would set my ears on guard and read aloud. I remember when I had finished, there was in my consciousness, about this impression of what I had read:

I purpose to write the history of England from the accession of King James the Second down to a time that is within the memory of men still living. I wonder why she flung those ducks back into the dumb-waiter?

And so it went. My tongue was reading Macaulay. My mind was dwelling on the ducks. Soon I discovered myself wandering in imagination up and down stairs trying to find their owner, with an apology already framed. I threw the book aside and fell asleep. When I awoke it was near five o'clock. The flat was dark and silent as a tomb. My wife would be coming shortly and I thought I would get the dinner started. So I strung the beans and pared the potatoes and got a fire going. The pots were boiling merrily in a short time, and then I spread the table, and got out some of our best china. It occurred to me, suddenly, that a few flowers would improve the looks of the table, and so I hurried away and bought a fine display of roses and ferns. On my return, a strong odor greeted me at the door. The water had boiled out of one of the pots and the beans had touched bottom. The potatoes were also crumbling on the verge of dissolution. I made things move so quickly then that I scalded my hand with hot steam. I lost my temper for a moment and flung the empty potato kettle into the air. It left its black footprint on the wall and came down with a mighty crash, and as it rolled back to me, I kicked it across the room with a remark which had better be omitted. Then I heard the door of the dumb-waiter open just below me.

"Ye'd better break a hole in the ceiling an' done with it," somebody shouted.

I began to cool down a bit shortly, and swathed my hand in a wet cloth, and fixed the beans and potatoes and put them away in the oven. They looked all right, and I began to broil the beefsteak with a feeling of remorse. When it lay on the platter at last with a golden crown of butter on it and a sprinkle of pepper over all, I grew hungry at the sight. "Now," I thought, "the quicker she comes the better."

The table looked superb in its fresh cover of snowy linen, with delicate sprays of fern surrounding the centerpiece of roses. Little groups of china, decorated in gold and blue, added the glow of luxury.

"There'll be one surprised woman when she does come," I said to myself, sitting down to cool off.

I looked at the clock. It was half after six, and she was long overdue. What could have happened to her? It had been very hot in the sun—perhaps she had been overcome and taken to some hospital. The gloomy day grew dusk, and there was something in that silence like the stealthy footfall of disaster. I sat a long time listening, hoping, fearing, imagining all manner of evil. I went into the dark kitchen after a while and, lighting a match, peered into the oven. The fire had gone down; the beans had settled and turned black; the potatoes had a cold and sickly look; the steak had shrunk into a leathery patch at the bottom of the platter. I went back to my chair in the dining-room, utterly sick at heart.

"If she doesn't come in half an hour, I shall send out an alarm," I said to myself, and then a ring at the bell brought me to my feet. I opened the door, and there stood my wife.

"Poor thing," said she, "what has happened to you?"

"Madam," said I, with growing indignation, "I should like to know what has happened to you."

"Goodness!" said she, in that same kindly and provoking tone, "make a light and then I'll tell you."

"It's a fine time to be getting home," I said, with suppressed emotion, as I lighted a match; "where have you been?"

"Been to the club," she answered.

"Been to the club!" I repeated, with irony.

"Yes; been to the club," she went on, stepping into the bedroom and laying off her things. "I stayed longer than I intended and missed my train."

"POOR THING!" SAID SHE. "WHAT HAS HAPPENED?"

Unconsciously she used the same tone of voice with which I had answered her on similar occasions, and, oddly enough, it was about the same story I had told her a score of times. While I was lighting the gas in the dining-room, I thought how suddenly that feeling of romantic tenderness had gone out of my heart.

"Come here," said she presently, "I want you to look in the glass."

I had already seen it in the mantel mirror—that face of mine, black with soot and stern with emotion.

She came in before I could answer and saw the dinner table, and shortly we both went and washed our faces.

My dinner was cold and went with a bad relish, but she fell to with a smiling face and a stout heart and a word of praise for everything, just as I had done always.

I felt like talking after dinner. It was a great relief to have somebody to talk to after that long and lonely day.

"Tell me what you have been doing?" I said.

My wife sat gaping, her head leaning on her hand, a far-off look in her eyes. She had not heard me.

"What did you say?" she inquired.

"Oh, come," I said, "wake up. Let's have a good long talk. A wife is no comfort to a man when she sits and gazes at him with nothing to say."

"I'm too tired"—that was her answer—"I've to get up early and go and meet a friend of mine over in Brooklyn to-morrow morning. I must get through with the work and go to bed."

"When am I going to have a word with you --- that's what I'd like to know?" I said.

"Oh, by'n by," she answered. "Maybe I'll get malaria one of these days."

I began to grow thoughtful then, and got up and helped her clear the table, and went into the kitchen and wiped the dishes for her.

"How nice it is," said she, "just as I am able to go out a bit that you can turn your hand to such things."

"Not much," I answered; "I don't propose to be your servant or to let you be mine. We'll hire a girl and I'll manage to get home earlier, and we'll think less of money and more of happiness."

And that is what came of it.

ONE week later, the Times printed an item to the effect that Harwood had gone abroad. Stanton gave the matter no more thought, except to wonder a little that the mill owner had not been to see him, or tell him of his plans. But he was very busy preparing for his fall and winter lectures, and for the next few days Harwood was largely out of mind.

Two days before going out on his first lecture engagement, Stanton went down to the lower mill to get some facts concerning machinery, and its effects on the lives of the men. The mills had resumed work with both union and non-union men, and the strike was about over. It had been a part failure, but the Union had gained some minor advantages, and was biding its time for the next move.

Stanton came to the casting-room, and was standing close by the "Octopus," fascinated as always, whenever he watched it, when one of the workmen ran up to attach a chain to one of the derrick arms. As he finished the work and lifted up his body, Stanton had a new view of him. Through the grime and smoke and swirling gas wreaths of the place, he recognized in one startling moment, the face of Harwood. Harwood in the same moment saw that he was recognized, and as the foreman happened to be on the other side of the casting moulds, he stepped close up to Stanton and spoke to him hurriedly.

CHAPTER IV

"I DON'T need to tell you why I am here, Mr. Stanton. And I expect you to respect my secret. The foreman knows me. But since I shaved my beard, I don't think even Harvey would recognize me. The men in the mill did not know my face, and I am working here mostly with new men anyway. I'm a 'scab.'" He spoke the word with a grim smile. "I'll work out my salvation here—or, somewhere, Stanton. I have not been so happy for years. I'm at least one of the masses here. And the work keeps me from thinking of her."

He did not even try to shake Stanton's outstretched hand, but turned and caught up the steel bar he had dropped. Stanton watched him a moment, and then went on his way, leaving the once proud mill owner a part of the wrestling forces of human stress and struggle, under the ominous frown of the grim machine which knew no remorse or regret. But the image of the man trying to work out his salvation in the way he had chosen, haunted Stanton as he rose to speak to a great audience on the first night of his lecture engagement outside of Lenox.

Stanton faced his first audience away from home since his resignation from Saint Cecilia, with a feeling of trepidation. He knew that very many, if not all, in the great crowd, had come to see him out of curiosity. That placed a handicap on his message to start with. However, he began his lecture on "What are the Rights of Mankind?" by quoting Abraham Lincoln, "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it." Using this as a broad text for his unfolding of the main thought, he went on to give certain definitions; first of all, the definition of the word Socialism, as given by the best and latest dictionaries. "Any theory or system of social organization which would abolish entirely, or, in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it co-operative action, would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor, and would make land and capital as the instruments and means of production, the joint possession of the members of the community." (Century Dictionary.)

He also quoted John Stuart Mill's definition: "Socialism is the joint ownership by all members of the community of the instrument and means of production; which carries with it, the consequence that the division of the produce among the body of owners must be a public act, performed according to rules laid down by the community. Socialism by no means excludes private ownership of articles of consumption." (Century Dictionary.)

After dwelling on the fact that these definitions did not need to scare anyone, Stanton went on with a number of short paragraphic sentences to declare on what the rights of man were based, and to show, that no matter what other kinds of Socialism might lead up to, Christian Socialism could not, by any possibility, mean anything except the realization of a genuine brotherhood.

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

"The rights of man are coincident with his duties. His rights are not selfish prerogatives, they are mutual concessions.

"The Christian Brotherhood is an impossibility, unless in the heart exists a love of God, together with a love of man. In other words, a social betterment of the race is impossible, unless it has a deep, true religious basis. To leave out the religious element, is to leave out one of the absolute necessities of any social progress.

"I need hardly say that I repudiate with the deepest horror, the teaching of such men as William Morris on the marriage relation, when he says, 'marriage under existing conditions is absurd; the family about which so much twaddle is talked, is hateful.' Or Fourier, 'Monogamy and private prosperity are the main characteristics of civilization. The individual family is the unit of all faulty societies divided by opposing interests!'

"Such statements are from the pit. I need hardly say that men like Charles Kingsley, Fredrick Maurice, Thomas Hughes, and Dr. Lyman Abbott, together with women like Miss Willard, who believe profoundly in a Christian Brotherhood, have no other view of marriage and the family, than the view of Christ and the New Testament. Whatever touches the integrity of the family touches the foundation of society. The increase of divorces, the wicked facility with which men and women sever the sacred tie, the loose and sneering conception of this relation, which is entertained especially by men and women of no other aim in life except to amuse themselves; all this is far away from the plan of a Christian Brotherhood as hell from heaven. Over 25,000 divorces were granted in the United States last year for incompatibility of temper! Think of the enormity of such a tearing down of the cornerstone of the Republic! If incompatibility of temper were a just cause for divorce, how many marriages would stand the test? It is probably true, that during the first few years of married life, even among professed Christian people, the majority of husbands and wives discover certain weaknesses and faults in each other. It is also probably true, that a majority of married people find in certain directions that their tastes differ, and their opinions and habits often cross one another. What then shall be done? On account of this incompatibility of temper, shall this sacred compact—the most sacred known to human life—be carelessly, passionately, or cruelly broken, or shall it be the aim of the man and wife, who have grown to realize, even with pain, these differences between them, to emphasize the points on which they are in accord, to mutually overlook and minimize these differences, to respect each other, even while they differ; to live together as friends, even when they discover that neither one of them is an angel. The marriage relation is of such tremendous importance in its bearing on the whole social structure, that I have no hesitation in saying, that it is infinitely better for a husband and wife to live together quietly, without complaint and without reproach, even if each realized fully that the ideal love they thought they once had for each other is totally gone, than to separate on account of that fact, or even because each thought they might be happier with someone else. I believe among the heroes and heroines, among the saints of this world, have been many and many a married couple, who lived all their lives true to the married relation in spite of incompatibility, and very many more married people, who, at first discovery of these differences, supposed their married happiness was lost, who, as the years went by, recovered it, and grew to love each other more and more truly, because they determined each one not to wreck the greatest relation in life through a weak or wicked yielding to a selfish personal disappointment. The only safe marriages are those of genuine Christian people, who have a deeply religious principle in life, and realize that it is only through mutual sacrifice, mutual forgiveness, mutual charity, and forbearance, the marriage relation can be sustained in its fullest happiness and power. I repeat, the Christian Brotherhood cannot exist on any other basis except that of the sacredness of the family life. Any Socialism which contemplates a free society, which in any way throws contempt on this relation, which anticipates anything different from the Christian family, in its one husband for one wife until death do part, such Socialism has no more right to be entitled to the name of Christian, than hell has any right to be bounded with the pearly gates of the new Jerusalem."

As he finished this sentence, Stanton was aware of a commotion in different parts of the hall. Several men and women, their faces inflamed with passion, rose and began to go out. In the rear of the hall, a large man, with a voice like the roar of some wild animal, stood up on a seat and waved his arms excitedly asking Stanton some question about marriage.

Stanton stood quiet a moment and then sat down. On the platform with him that night were several ministers, pastors of the local churches of different denominations. They watched him curiously to see what he would do in the face of this new turn of affairs.

The man on the seat shouted out his something with a bellow that filled the building. The audience was variously affected by what had happened. There were hisses and applause. Some stood up to see the man who was making the disturbance. Others shouted to Stanton, "Go on! Go on! He's a crank!" Stanton sat like an image. Not a muscle quivered, not a sign of movement was visible. The man on the seat bellowed until he was hoarse. The audience began to hiss at him more and more, and Stanton kept his seat, absolutely unmoved.

Finally, the man, with one more yell, sat down suddenly, as if he had been assisted by someone nearby, and almost instantly the audience quieted down, until not a whisper was audible. Stanton deliberately rose, and in a low tone, said good-naturedly, "If the brother back there will kindly remain for a few moments after the lecture is over, I shall be pleased to answer his questions, if I am able. But I do not consider it fair to the audience to introduce that feature into the lecture itself."

The man tried to shout something, but the audience yelled at him to quit, and he subsided. Stanton went on and finished the lecture, and at the close, invited any who wished, to remain for a conference of question and answer.

While those who did not accept his invitation were going out, Stanton was touched and deeply helped by the warm sympathy of the ministers who had been on the platform. They came up around him and expressed their feelings cordially.

"I never understood your views until to-night, Brother Stanton," said the Methodist minister. "I want to congratulate you on your Christian soundness. I expected something altogether different. Your views on the marriage question ought to be preached from every pulpit in America."

The Congregational minister shook his hand hard. "I'm with you, Brother Stanton, on what you said at the close of your lecture, on the factor of love as the only foundation on which to build up a structure of social progress. I have read all the current books and articles on social reconstruction, and I am sick at heart over their omissions of the greatest factor of all, the one thing Christ emphasized most. The Lord bless you, Brother Stanton, as you bring this message to the people."

The Baptist, Christian, and Presbyterian ministers, were also hearty in their words of encouragement, and Stanton, whose heart was in love with the Church, in spite of Saint Cecilia, felt a strange and almost overwhelming desire to weep at the evidence of their Christian fellowship.

To his surprise, fully half the audience had remained to the conference. He asked the people to get together in the middle of the hall, and as soon as they were quiet, he called for the man who wanted to ask questions about marriage.

Someone down near the door laughed. "That was Stollwitz. He works in the roller mills. His wife came after him just at the close of the meeting, and he followed her out as meek as a lamb."

"Can you take me to his house to-morrow, friend, or tell me where to find him?" asked Stanton. A workman down near the platform said he knew, and gave Stanton the address.

The conference went on for an hour. A majority of the audience was workmen. They put such questions as these:

"Do you believe in trade-unions?"

"Is marriage oftener a failure with the rich than with the poor?"

"You said the Sabbath was being desecrated more and more by the working people of America. How about those big corporations like railroads, cement, and oil works, and large mills that run every day in the week, and make it impossible for thousands of working people to have one day of rest in seven?"

"Wouldn't the churches get nearer the workers if they abolished pew-rents, and paid their preachers no more than average labor is paid?"

"If one reason the workmen spend so much money for beer, is the wretched condition of the average tenement, bad cooking, and so forth, how about the men who own the tenements, some of whom are church members?"

"Isn't it a fact, that most of the divorces you spoke of were among well-to-do people, not among the poor or average workers?"

"To what extent did Charles Kingsley, Thomas Hughes, and Fredrick Maurice believe in Socialism?"

"Do you think the negro is entitled to all the rights of a citizen?"

"Last January, February and March, of 1902, 300 employees were killed, and 2,834 injured in railroad accidents in this country. During those three months 1,650 trains were in collision, and 1,181 trains were derailed. Adding the accidents sustained by railroad employees in shops, due to machinery, there was a total, during the three months, of 827 killed, and 11,481 injured. Do you think it is fair to suppose that most of these fatalities were caused by carelessness on the part of the men at work? It is a fact that more men are killed by machinery every year in America, than were killed during the entire Boer War. Who is most to blame for it?"

"If the scab insists on his right to work anywhere, and for any wages he pleases, without joining any Union, even, if in doing so, he robs my wife and children of bread, am I to love him? Is it not asking too much of human nature to do that?"

This is sufficient to give some idea of the kind of questions that poured in on Stanton for an hour. The people were, for the most part, good-natured, and evidently wanted to get honest answers to fair queries. When Stanton finally asked them to join him in a prayer at the close, there was a respectful quiet. Several men came up to shake hands, even at that late hour. One of them, a modest, quiet-appearing man, about Stanton's own age, gave his name as Colfax.

"Are you the Colfax who has organized those new grocery stores in this part of the State?" Stanton asked, with great interest.

"I expect I am. Would be glad to see you and get more light," Colfax said modestly. "Can't you come around in the morning?"

"Yes. I go on to Camden to-morrow evening. Shall I come in the forenoon?"

Colfax nodded, and gave Stanton his card. The next morning, Stanton found himself in Colfax's little store, and as it was early, the two were almost alone for a short while.

"I've heard of your plan, Mr. Colfax. I'm interested. Tell me about it?"

"I don't claim anything great or original in my business," Colfax answered modestly. "My father was a very rich man, as perhaps you know. But I couldn't see that his money gave him any comfort. The year before he died, during the great panic of '57, he lost everything, and I began life as a poor boy. I clerked it in a grocery store for ten years, and saved up enough in that time to start on my own account. The first rule I made for myself was this: I never want to get rich in business. I've added to that rule the following, which for the last eight years have worked out well:

"Business for the day closes promptly at six o'clock. All employees are paid in full at the close of each day.

"All transactions are cash, and no books are kept.

"All goods are sold at cost after $2.50 profits for the day has been made.

"There is no delivery service.

"Premises personally guarded against fire, to save the amount of insurance premium.

"No liquors, cigars, or tobacco are carried in stock.

"To the poor, all goods are sold at cost at all times."

[St. Louis Post Dispatch, June 14, 1903.]

"You may be interested, Mr. Stanton, in the following results. I have now fifteen stores, the daily profits of which are $2.50; annual profits, 313 working days, are $782.50. Annual profits of all the stores are $11,731.50. These profits are distributed partly in helping the poor; partly in opening new stores. That's about all."

"But I hear you are having some trouble with the trade-unions. How is that?"

Colfax smiled slightly.

"It's true. They began to boycott me a month ago, because my clerks were not members of the Union. At first I lost considerable trade. Then people heard of it, and began to rush me so that I couldn't wait on customers, and I made a new rule." He pointed to a card over the counter, which read, "Help yourself, and leave the money at the desk." "You see every article in the store is marked in plain figures, its selling price. I think I have lost a very little by this method, through the dishonesty of a few people; but it doesn't begin to compare with the losses the average grocer sustains every day through careless extravagance and lack of saving habits. The store will be crowded all day to-day. But I'll have to move out on account of the owner of the building. The Union threatens to boycott him, and he claims he can't stand the pressure. I'm not able to buy, and shall move."

"Will your clerks join the Union to avoid trouble?"

"I don't think so," Colfax answered quietly. "Two of them have already been attacked by members of the Union on the street. It isn't likely they will join an organization that employs such methods. I can't urge them to do so, just to save me. Besides, I don't believe in that sort of way of doing business. For the last five years I've sold goods to the members of the trade-unions in this city at cost. They now turn against me with a boycott, because my clerks do not belong to the Union. I don't hate them, you understand, Mr. Stanton. But my convictions are such that I shall continue to do business on the same plan, and hire my clerks anywhere from the most honest, reliable men I can find. I don't claim, either, that my plan of doing business will bring in the millennium. But I do know that I am a far happier man than my father was with his great wealth, and also hope that a good many other people are made happier by my methods. How the matter between the Unions and myself will come out, I don't know. Time will settle that. But I am a great believer in human progress, and I believe the members of the Unions will, in time, use other methods to gain their ends."

Stanton left him, impressed with the man's modest sincerity, and musing over his statement about being happier than his father. "Truly, it is a great fact, he said to himself, as he went down towards the roller mills, near which Stollwitz lived, 'that as Jesus said, 'A man's life does not consist in the abundance of things that he possesses.' 'Man shall not live by bread alone.' If what we are after is happiness, how foolishly we stumble and strive after it, learning nothing, apparently, from the mistakes and troubles of those who have made history in vain for us."

It was his keen sense of justice that sent him down into the neighborhood of the roller mills, to find this workman who had disturbed his meeting. What was one poor laborer more or less? Yet, Stanton groping his way toward a deeper sympathy and quicker apprehension in all things that belong to the life of man, was rapidly growing more charitable in his judgments of all sorts and conditions of men.

He found the number of Stollwitz's house, and knocked at the door, not expecting to see the man himself, for he had been told that he worked on the night shift, and would probably be asleep. But, to his surprise, the man himself opened the door, and stood in the narrow passage-way staring at him.

"I'm Mr. Stanton, the man who was trying to talk last night, while you were trying to do the same thing," said Stanton, with a smile. "I came down here to find out what it was you wanted to ask, as you didn't stay to the after-meeting."

The man stared so long and hard, that Stanton was in great doubt as to his sanity. But suddenly he burst into a roar of laughter, and putting out a hand that looked, for size and shape, like a sugar-cured ham, he said, in a voice that a vegetable vender would have considered worth half the season's profits:

"Mister Stanton! Come in, sir! I'm honored and delighted!" He dragged Stanton through a narrow hall, into a small, but astonishingly neat room, at one end of which a small woman was frying something on a stove.

"Kathrine, Dr. Stanton—the author of The Christian Socialist."

Kathrine wiped her hands on her apron, and shook hands shyly, but without any other mark of embarrassment. Stollwitz pointed to a chair, and seemed to be profoundly pleased. He laughed and made great noises that were like a mingling of foreign languages, and an attempt to swallow something out of a pitcher. At last, Stanton noting the preparations for a meal that were going on, said:

"Mr. Stollwitz, I did not mean to interrupt your breakfast, but—"

"Interrupt! My friend, that breakfast will not be interrupted. Sit up with us. Kathrine, are you ready? Shall I open the door?"

His wife nodded, as she set some dishes down on the table, and Stollwitz went to a door at the other end, unlocked it and opened it, and there poured out into the room, as if released from pressure behind, five children, whose names the big mechanic gave to Stanton, as the owners of them gravely went up to their chairs and stood by them. "Children, this is Dr. Fredrick Stanton, who has honored us extremely by his visit. Gertrude, Luther, Hans, William, Kathrine. Now then, Luther, you may ask the grace this morning."

All the family stood up around the table, and the boy, a yellow-haired youth of some twelve years, said, in a simple tone:

For all the blessings of the night,
For all the mercies of the light,
Father, we thank Thee for them all.
Be with us till the shadows fall. Amen.

"Amen!" echoed every member of the family. And before he knew it, Stanton was seated with the rest, astonished to find himself, instead of in the presence of one of the sullen, blatant specimens of foreign life he had expected to meet, in the heart of a devout Christian family.

"Now that grace was nicely said, my lad," said Stollwitz, whose big voice made the tinware rattle; "What would you think, sir, I was with Herr Stauber's family some time ago, and one of his boys, just home from college, asked the grace, and he said, 'O Lord, have mercy on these victuals!' but Stauber never seemed to guess anything wrong with that. And his table is not any too well provided for at any time."

Stanton began to think he should never get around to the question Stollwitz had tried to ask the night before. The novelty of the situation appealed to him, and he thoroughly enjoyed every minute, although he had already had one breakfast at the hotel.

"We are late," Mrs. Stollwitz said in a pause, during which her husband had laughed again in the same mixed manner as before. "But my husband goes on to work at midnight, and does his eight hours of work. He was unusually late about getting back this morning."

"We are having trouble at the mills, yes," said Stollwitz, with sudden gravity. "Between the Union and the non-union men. Ach! Why cannot men live like brethren? I try to preach it. They laugh. Very few does anything more!"

He put up a fist on the table that was as big as a loaf of brown bread, and the smallest child, Kathrine, regarded it with big-eyed awe.

Christmas Eve in a Lumber Camp

By RALPH CONNOR, in "Black Rock"

IT was due to a mysterious dispensation of Providence, and a good deal to Leslie Graeme, that I found myself in the heart of the Selkirks for my Christmas Eve as the year 1882 was dying. It had been my plan to spend my Christmas far away in Toronto, with such Bohemian and boon companions as could be found in that cosmopolitan and kindly city. But Leslie Graeme changed all that, for, discovering me in the village of Black Rock, with my traps all packed, waiting for the stage to start for the Landing, thirty miles away, he bore down upon me with irresistible force, and I found myself recovering from my surprise only after we had gone in his lumber sleigh some six miles on our way to his camp up in the mountains.

The camp stood in a little clearing, and consisted of a group of three long, low shanties with smaller shacks near them, all built of heavy, unhewn logs, with door and window in each. The grub camp, with cook-shed attached, stood in the middle of the clearing; at a little distance was the sleeping-camp, with the office built against it, and about a hundred yards away on the other side of the clearing stood the stables, and near them the smiddy. The mountains rose grandly on every side, throwing up their great peaks into the sky. The clearing in which the camp stood was hewn out of a dense pine forest, that filled the valley and climbed half way up the mountain-sides, and then frayed out in scattered and stunted trees.

It was one of those wonderful Canadian winter days, bright, and with a touch of sharpness in the air that did not chill, but warmed the blood like draughts of wine. The men were up in the woods, and the shrill scream of the blue jay flashing across the open, the impudent chatter of the red squirrel from the top of the grub camp, and the pert chirp of the whisky-jack, hopping about on the rubbish-heap, with the long, lone cry of the wolf far down the valley, only made the silence felt the more.

As I stood drinking in with all my soul the glorious beauty and the silence of mountain and forest, with the Christmas feeling stealing into me, Graeme came out from his office, and, catching sight of me, called out, "Glorious Christmas weather, old chap!" And then, coming nearer, "Must you go to-morrow?"

"I fear so," I replied, knowing well that the Christmas feeling was on him, too.

"I wish I were going with you," he said quietly.

I turned eagerly to persuade him, but at the look of suffering in his face the words died at my lips, for we both were thinking of the awful night of horror when all his bright, brilliant life crashed down about him in black ruin and shame. I could only throw my arm over his shoulder and stand silent beside him. A sudden jingle of bells roused him, and, giving himself a little shake, he exclaimed, "There are the boys coming home."

Soon the camp was filled with men talking, laughing, chaffing, like light-hearted boys.

"They are a little wild to-night," said Graeme; "and to-morrow they'll paint Black Rock red."

Before many minutes had gone, the last teamster was "washed up," and all were standing about waiting impatiently for the cook's signal—the supper to-night was to be "something of a feed"—when the sound of bells drew their attention to a light sleigh drawn by a buckskin broncho coming down the hillside at a great pace.

"The preacher, I'll bet, by his driving," said one of the men.

"Bedad, and it's him has the foine nose for turkey!" said Blaney, a good-natured, jovial Irishman.

"Yes, or for pay-day, more like," said Keefe, a black-browed, villainous fellow-countryman of Blaney's, and, strange to say, his great friend.

Big Sandy McNaughton, a Canadian Highlander from Glengarry, rose up in wrath. "Bill Keefe," said he, with deliberate emphasis, "you'll just keep your dirty tongue off the minister; and as for your pay, it's little he sees of it, or any one else, except Mike Slavin, when you're too dry to wait for some one to treat you, or perhaps Father Ryan, when the fear of hell-fire is on you."

The men stood amazed at Sandy's sudden anger and length of speech.

"Bon; dat's good for you, my bully boy," said Baptiste, a wiry little French-Canadian, Sandy's sworn ally and devoted admirer ever since the day when the big Scotsman, under great provocation, had knocked him clean off the dump into the river and then jumped in for him.

It was not till afterward I learned the cause of Sandy's sudden wrath, which urged him to such unwonted length of speech. It was not simply that the Presbyterian blood carried with it reverence for the minister and contempt for Papists and Fenians, but that he had a vivid remembrance of how, only a month ago, the minister had got him out of Mike Slavin's saloon and out of the clutches of Keefe and Slavin and their gang of blood-suckers.

Keefe started up with a curse. Baptiste sprang to Sandy's side, slapped him on the back, and called out, "You keel him, I'll hit (eat) him up, me."

It looked as if there might be a fight, when a harsh voice said in a low, savage tone, "Stop your row, you fools; settle it, if you want to, somewhere else." I turned, and was amazed to see old man Nelson, who was very seldom moved to speech.

There was a look of scorn on his hard, iron-gray face, and of such settled fierceness as made me quite believe the tales I had heard of his deadly fights in the mines at the coast. Before any reply could be made, the minister drove up and called out in a cheery voice, "Merry Christmas, boys! Hello, Sandy! Comment ca va, Baptiste? How do you do, Mr. Graeme?"

"First rate. Let me introduce my friend, Mr. Connor, sometime medical student, now artist, hunter, and tramp at large, but not a bad sort."

"A man to be envied," said the minister, smiling. "I am glad to know any friend of Mr. Graeme's."

I liked Mr. Craig from the first. He had good eyes that looked straight out at you, a clean-cut, strong face well set on his shoulders, and altogether an upstanding, manly bearing.

Then the cook came out and beat a tattoo on the bottom of a dish-pan. Baptiste answered with a yell; but though keenly hungry, no man would demean himself to do other than walk with apparent reluctance to his place at the table. At the further end of the camp was a big fireplace, and from the door to the fireplace extended the long board tables, covered with platters of turkey not too scientifically carved, dishes of potatoes, bowls of apple sauce, plates of butter, pies, and smaller dishes distributed at regular intervals. Two lanterns hanging from the roof, and a row of candles stuck into the wall on either side by means of slit sticks, cast a dim, weird light over the scene.

There was a moment's silence, and at a nod from Graeme Mr. Craig rose and said, "I don't know how you feel about it, men, but to me this looks good enough to be thankful for."

"Fire ahead, sir," called out a voice quite respectfully, and the minister bent his head and said:

"For Christ the Lord who came to save us, for all the love and goodness we have known, and for these thy gifts to us this Christmas night, our Father, make us thankful. Amen."

"Bon, dat's fuss rate," said Baptiste. "Seems lak dat's make me hit (eat) more better for sure," and then no word was spoken for a quarter of an hour. The occasion was far too solemn and moments too precious for anything so empty as words.

After the voices had ceased, Mr. Craig drew from his pocket his little Bible, and said:

"Men, with Mr. Graeme's permission, I want to read you something this Christmas Eve. You will all have heard it before, but you will like it none the less for that."

His voice was soft, but clear and penetrating, as he read the eternal story of the angels and the shepherds and the Babe. And as he read, a slight motion of the hand or a glance of an eye made us see, as he was seeing, that whole radiant drama. The wonder, the timid joy, the tenderness, the mystery of it all, were borne in upon us with overpowering effect. He closed the book, and in the same low, clear voice went on to tell us how, in his home, years ago, he used to stand on Christmas Eve listening in thrilling delight to his mother telling him the story, and how she used to make him see the shepherds and hear the sheep bleating near by, and how the sudden burst of glory used to make his heart jump.

"But one Christmas Eve," he went on, in a lower, sweeter tone, "there was no one to tell me the story, and I grew to forget it, and went away to college, and learned to think that it was only a child's tale and was not for men. Then bad days came to me and worse, and I began to lose my grip of myself, of life, of hope, of goodness, till one black Christmas, in the slums of a far-away city, when I had given up all, and the devil's arms were about me, I heard the story again. And as I listened, with a bitter ache in my heart, for I had put it all behind me, I suddenly found myself peeking under the shepherds' arms with a child's wonder at the Baby in the straw. Then it came over me like great waves, that his name was Jesus, because it was he that should save men from their sins. Save! Save! The waves kept beating upon my ears, and before I knew, I had called out, 'Oh! can He save me?' It was in a little mission meeting on one of the side streets, and they seemed to be used to that sort of thing there, for no one was surprised; and a young fellow leaned across the aisle to me and said, 'Why! you just bet He can!' His surprise that I should doubt, his bright face and confident tone, gave me hope that perhaps it might be so. I held to that hope with all my soul, and"—stretching up his arms, and with a quick glow in his face and a little break in his voice, "He hasn't failed me yet; not once!"

The minister went on. "I didn't mean to tell you this, men, it all came over me with a rush; but it is true, every word, and not a word will I take back. And, what's more, I can tell you this, what He did for me He can do for any man, and it doesn't make any difference what's behind him, and"—leaning slightly forward, and with a little thrill of pathos vibrating in his voice—"O boys, why don't you give him a chance at you? Without Him you'll never be the men you want to be, and you'll never get the better of that that's keeping some of you now from going back home. You know you'll never go back till you're the men you want to be." Then, lifting up his face and throwing back his head, he said, as if to himself, "Jesus! He shall save his people from their sins," and then, "Let us pray."

After the prayer, Mr. Craig invited the men to a Christmas dinner next day in Black Rock. "And because you are an independent lot, we'll charge you half a dollar for dinner and the evening show." Then leaving a bundle of magazines and illustrated papers on the table—a godsend to the men—he said good-bye and went out.

A man stepped out from the shadow. It was old man Nelson. He came straight to the sleigh, and, ignoring my presence completely, said:

"Mr. Craig, are you dead sure of this? Will it work?"

"Do you mean," said Craig, taking him up promptly, "can Jesus Christ save you from your sins and make a man of you?"

The old man nodded, keeping his hungry eyes on the other's face.

"Well, here's his message to you: 'The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.'"

"To me? To me?" said the old man eagerly.

"Listen; this, too, is his Word: 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.' That's for you, for here you are, coming."

"You don't know me, Mr. Craig. I left my baby fifteen years ago because—"

"Stop!" said the minister. "Don't tell me, at least not to-night; perhaps never. Tell Him who knows it all now, and who never betrays a secret. Have it out with Him. Don't be afraid to trust Him."

Nelson looked at him, with his face quivering, and said in a husky voice, "If this is no good, it's hell for me."

"If it is no good," replied Craig, almost sternly, "it's hell for all of us."

The old man straightened himself up, looked up at the stars, then back at Mr. Craig, then at me, and, drawing a deep breath said, "I'll try Him."

Before we took the next turn, I looked back and saw what brought a lump into my throat. It was old man Nelson on his knees in the snow, with his hands spread upward to the stars. And then the trees hid him from my sight.

The Benke Memorial Service

ON Tuesday evening, December 6th, the Bowery Mission hall was filled with the friends of Victor H. Benke, who had met in memory of the dead organist, and to witness the unveiling of the bronze tablet commemorating his work and life among the men of the Bowery. The exercises opened with the hymn, "I will sing of Thy redemption," sung by the congregation. Mr. T. J. Bryant then sang "The Vacant Chair." After prayer, by Rev. Dr. McPherson of Jane Street M. E. Church, the congregation again joined in singing another hymn of Mr. Benke's composition. Mrs. Sarah J. Bird spoke very feelingly of "her boy," as she always loves to call him, and was followed by Rev. Donald Sage Mackay, D.D., who, in an inspiring speech, paid an earnest tribute to the memory of Mr. Benke.

Addresses followed by Rev. S. H. Hadley and others. Miss Grace Hildebrand and Mrs. Broadbent lent their finely cultivated voices, each singing a solo, the former rendering another Benke composition, "Just for To-day," and the latter, Handel's "Angels Ever Bright and Fair." Mrs. Hallmond, the ever-helpful wife of the superintendent, sang "I'm Holding On," and Mr. J. T. Hunt, of the Bowery Mission Quartette, "Just As I Am," both compositions of the man in whose memory the meeting was held. Dr. Klopsch then, in a few well-chosen and appropriate words, unveiled the tablet.

The funds for this tablet were contributed by friends of Mr. Benke, many of them belonging to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. All the money in excess of the cost of the tablet was to be given to the widow. Deducting the cost of the tablet—$125.00—this sum will amount to about $350.00, which will greatly assist the young widow in caring for the little daughter, whom the death of the organist left fatherless.

A STALLED

CHRISTMAS

SNOW began falling just after midday. The sky was leaden, the day dark, with low, hanging clouds and gusts of piercing wind. Though the cars were steam-heated, they were cold, and about four o'clock they were dark. Outside, the great flakes fell steadily, and the engine forged ahead through a gathering storm that promised to be a blizzard.

It was a long passenger train, with one Pullman and a string of day coaches. The conductor came through at five, and the only lady in the Pullman asked him anxiously if they were on time, and if he thought they would reach Blenheim by ten o'clock?

He shook his head. "We're in an awful blizzard, Miss, and the drifts are deep. Looks to me as if we might be stalled a day or two on the road. I presume they'll have the snow-ploughs out soon as the storm stops. Don't be down-hearted. You won't starve. We're not out of provisions."

"But, conductor, this is the day before Christmas!" "Just so! I'd like to see my wife and the kids on Christmas, but I don't reckon on it. We've a lot of youngsters aboard this train. I'm afraid it won't be much of a Christmas for them, poor things!"

He went on, and the young lady settled back in her seat with a sigh of disappointment. Seventy-five miles from home, no more than that, and she had not seen home and father and mother and the other dear ones in six long months. She was a traveling secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association, and accustomed to delays and vicissitudes of the road; but seldom had she so set her whole heart on arriving promptly at a given destination, as on this particular occasion. The last college she had visited was in a small village, on the line which connected with her own home town, and it had been the farthest western point in her itinerary. As she turned her face eastward, she had been as happy as a bird faring home to its nest. Friends at the college, weather-wise in the tokens of the region, had urged her to stay over a day, but she had been resolute in her determination to have a home Christmas, and had started, her heart singing its undernote of joy with every mile, until, after a threatening morning and a gray afternoon, the night had settled into this blizzard.

She was the single lady passenger in the Pullman. Her companions in the car were three men, two young and one old. The latter, who had been regarding her with interest, came and stood beside her seat.

"I think I am not mistaken," he said; "you are Miss Mary Reynolds, of Blenheim, Judge Reynolds' daughter?"

"Yes," she replied.

"Well, I am your father's old classmate, Michael Saunders, and am on my way to his house. You may like to read his letter, and then, if you will allow me, I'll sit down by you and tell you how I happened to be running up from Pasadena in the teeth of such a tempest as this which has pounced upon us. I was not sure of you, or I would have spoken sooner. When you were talking with the conductor just now, there were vibrations in your voice that made me think of your mother. We boys were all in love with her, but Dick Reynolds carried off the prize. Your father speaks of you as taking this route home for the holidays."

A little cheered by finding a friend, with whose name she was familiar, although she had never met him before, Mary Reynolds spent the evening more pleasantly than she had anticipated. They had supper, with a cup of steaming coffee, and she went to bed, as the conductor assured her she might as well do, sleeping soundly till morning.

She awoke to behold a world of white and glistening splendor. Everywhere a world of deep, pure, sparkling snow. Far-off the mountain peaks ice-capped and glorious. The train was standing still, hemmed in by drifts on every side. It was a beautiful, white, cold Christmas, and they might have been on the earth alone, for all trace of other inhabitants. The wind had ceased, the sun had come forth in the clear sky.

"Conductor," said Mary Reynolds, with a good morning that was tranquil, though not gay, "I wish you a Merry Christmas. Do you think we'll get on in an hour or two?"

"There is no telling," he answered. "I fear we'll have to spend our Christmas where we are."

"There are children aboard?"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"Lots of 'em, and their mothers are as blue as they are. We've hardly rations to go round them all, you see, and their lunch baskets are pretty nigh used up. After awhile, if we're stalled all day, the farmers from yonder will get in with their sleds, and bring us bread and meat. But it's a blue Christmas for the children."

"Mr. Saunders," said Miss Reynolds, "don't you feel as if this is an opportunity to do a little missionary work?"

"Whatever you propose," was the ready reply. "Where you lead, I'll follow."

"Well, here we are, and we can't help ourselves. Providence has placed us here on Christmas Day. And close by us, are enough little people for a small Sunday School, and they are going to miss their Christmas altogether; to have no presents, no dinner, and no fun. Now I propose to brighten the day for them, if I can."

"May we help?" diffidently came from one of the young fellows across the aisle. "I've my banjo with me."

"And I can sing," added his companion.

"Four of us," Miss Reynolds cheerily said, "ought to be able to entertain the little wayfarers. Do you suppose the conductor will let us have them in here?"

"I don't fancy he'll object very strenuously, but I'll ask him," said Mr. Saunders. "I'll propitiate the porter first. He'll be the one to object if any one does. Now, shall we make a tour of the train?"

The tired mothers and fathers, and the cross and fretful children on the train were lounging in every sort of uncomfortable posture in the seats of the day coaches. Children were crying and quarreling.

One wee bit of a girlie, golden-haired, with eyes hidden by long-fringed lashes, lay curled up in a corner of the seat nearest the door. She was sound asleep. On her frock was a tag. She was traveling all by herself.

"Poor baby!" said the conductor. "She has gotten into life's hurly-burly too soon. That little one was shipped from New York to San Francisco, by somebody who wanted to get rid of her. At Frisco there was nobody to receive her, and the Express people are sending her back."

Miss Reynolds bent over the little sleeper. Five years old, perhaps, her name on the tag, Elsie Dane, prettily dressed, yet a waif that some one had thrust out on the cold charity of the world. The lady, with a tender hand, adjusted the shawl that covered the child, and took a look over the car. Then she signaled to one of the gentlemen who had entered it with her, and immediately he struck up a merry jig on his banjo. The tumpatumpat-tum of the banjo may not be the heart-stirring beat of the drum, nor the sweet-thrilling note of the fife, but it has a rollicking melody that goes straight to the souls of children and common folk who like a tune. Everybody understands the banjo; this performer played it blithely.

At once the car felt the bracing effect of the ringing melody. The children quit their fretting, their crossness quelled by the music, the mothers brightened up, the fathers and big boys threw back their heads, straightened their neckties and looked more cheerful. Then the little procession of men went through the train, and presently returned, bringing with them all the children they could gather. They followed the banjo player as the children in Browning's ballad followed the pied piper of Hamelin, but to no such calamitous end. For when they were all assembled in the same car, a young lady with a voice as sweet as an angel's, said:

"Children, this is Christmas! Merry Christmas to you, one and all! We're going to have some fun in our car, and we invite you in. Eat what breakfast you can, and then come. I've got candy and popcorn!"

So she had. Not very much, but enough to go round the little crowd.

Mr. Saunders picked up golden-haired Elsie, and carried her into the parlor car in his arms.

The Christmas music never sounded sweeter than when Mary Reynolds sang Martin Luther's hymn:

Give heed my heart, lift up thine eyes,
Who is it in yon manger lies?
Who is this Child, so young and fair?
The blessed Christ-Child lieth there.

Ah, dearest Jesus, Holy Child,
Make Thee a bed, soft, undefiled,
Within my heart, that it may be
A quiet chamber, kept for Thee.

My heart for very joy doth leap,
My lips no more can silence keep;
I too must sing with joyful tongue
That sweetest, ancient cradle song.

When she stopped, the children clamored for more, but she asked her friend to play again on the banjo, and then Mr. Saunders came to the front and taught them a carol. By this time the whole train had caught the spirit of Christmas, and far out over the new-fallen snow rang the triumphant chorals.

The conductor came in after awhile with a bag of peanuts, which were received with acclamation. Then, as the children ate them, he drew Miss Reynolds aside.

"I do not think it would be wrong for you to read the letter that was sent, as it happened, with this little girl, whom I am carrying back to go into an asylum. The man to whom it was addressed handed it back to me. He said there was some mistake; he had children enough of his own, and knew nothing about this party."

Mary Reynolds opened the letter. The child was now awake, an exquisite little being with great brown eyes, and a skin like satin. As she saw the writing, she suppressed an exclamation. The hand was familiar, though weak and scrawling.

DEAR BROTHER: This letter will not be sent you till I am dead. I am now in the hospital, and the doctors say I cannot last more than another day. Take care of my Elsie. She is alone in the world.

MILDRED DANE.

"I knew Mildred Dane at college," said Mary Reynolds. "This is her child. She was Mildred Rutherford, and this letter, addressed by the nurse or doctor, is to Mr. Samuel Rutherford. It got to the wrong person. Until we can find the right one, I will assume the charge of Elsie. I remember to have heard that Mr. Dane died somewhere abroad. I suppose the poor mother was penniless. She was an orphan herself. I am sure she would like me to have Elsie."

"But the Express Company?"

"Their duty ended when they delivered the parcel," said the conductor. "I am carrying her back. You can make inquiries at the other end when you reach Blenheim. I'll take the responsibility of giving her to you for the present."

There was some demur about the propriety of this, but Mr. Saunders added his word, and Mary Reynolds, drawing the little one close, said: "Now, baby, for awhile you shall belong to me—my little Christmas Child!"

Noon was drawing near. The weather was cold, but growing milder. Over the snow came farmers with eggs, butter, bread, meat, cold chicken, pumpkin and mince pies, and the hungry passengers bought out all they offered. It was a rather jolly Christmas after all. Everybody talked to everybody else. One man performed some sleight-of-hand tricks. Another told stories. The people visited back and forth in the cars, and the children frolicked in the deep snow. In the late afternoon they had a regular singing service, and just as their voices trailed off into silence the snow-ploughs came, and there was a shout that the way was clear.

Late on Christmas night Mary Reynolds reached her father's house, carrying with her little Elsie. The stalled Christmas lives in the memory of both, for Elsie's uncle was never found, and Elsie Dane, blossoming into rare loveliness, is still to Mary Reynolds her Christmas Child.

BEFORE THE FIRST CHRISTMAS

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

FOR six months we are to follow the life of Christ in weekly lessons and daily readings. Surely this is the greatest of all studies! More important than the study of minerals, and vegetables, and animals, is the study of man, God's last and greatest creation; and in Jesus Christ we study man at his best, and also God, the most important study of all.

How many lives of Christ have we in the Bible? Those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John—yes; but there are two more evangels that give the "good news" of the human life of God, from the manger to the resurrection. Can you think what they are? Really, the first Gospel is that of Isaiah and other prophets, that from the very day of the fall of man, promised that a woman's son, "born," and yet "from everlasting," should become the bruised Conqueror of sin (Gen. 3:15; Isa. 9:6; Mic. 5:2). Quite a complete life of Christ can be made from the prophecies and symbols in which his earthly life and work are described in advance. Then the second Gospel in order of time is that of Paul, some of whose epistles were the first portions of the New Testament to be written. Even the infidels admit that Romans, First and Second Corinthians and Galatians, were written within thirty years after the crucifixion, while men who saw it were alive. It would be interesting to gather all that Paul says of Jesus Christ in those epistles, like mosaic stones, and arrange them in an orderly life of Christ, in which will be found all that is of highest importance, with a fuller interpretation of the cross and the resurrection, than is given even by John, who wrote the last and fullest life of Christ.

Why was it necessary to have more than one biography of Christ, and how does John's Gospel differ from all the others? Four or five witnesses, telling the same story independently, and yet corroborating each other, are certainly better than one from the standpoint of evidence. Greenleaf, the chief authority among lawyers, examines the evidence given by these men, as to the words and deeds of Christ, and finds it such as would prove any case in a court of justice, and all the stronger for the variety of statement, which sometimes seems to be contradiction, but on closer inspection proves to be only such a unity in variety, as must be found among independent and truthful witnesses. This variety also makes the story of Jesus interesting and impressive to readers as varied as the writers, whose human peculiarities were utilized to that end by the inspiring Spirit of God, who held them back from error, but left them large liberty to tell the story to human ears with human tongues.

Matthew wrote more especially for the Jews. Mark writes as the secretary of Peter, especially for the Romans. Luke writes as Paul's secretary, for all Gentiles. John's story is fuller and deeper, partly because the mother of Jesus lived with him and told him things, especially about the first year of Christ's ministry, that his other biographers did not know; and partly because he wrote later, when the divine meanings of Christ's words and deeds were better understood. The most striking difference between John's Gospel, and those of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, is that they begin the life of Jesus in Bethlehem, while John begins it in heaven.

1. Christ's Heavenly Name. In the beginning was the Word. Who or what is meant by "the Word"? It is fitting to note on this "Lord's name day" (Luke 2:21), that "The Word" was one of the many names of Jesus (v.14). As a word expresses thought and love and will, Jesus Christ expresses in a human life the thought and love and will of God in regard to man. "The Word became flesh, and tabernacled among us." As in the wilderness God dwelt among the tents of his people, in a tent of similar outward appearance, but all glorious within, so the shekinah light that shepherds and magi saw, was hidden in a babe swaddled like other children, in a working-boy and working-man, as coarsely clad as the lowliest. "The Word" as a name of Jesus, reminds us of a like name in the Old Testament "Wisdom," that seems to be used as a name of Jesus before he was manifested in the flesh. "St. Sophia," meaning "The Holy Wisdom," is the name of what was once a Christian Church, now a Mohammedan mosque in Constantinople. In it a picture of Christ that was painted over by Mohammedans, is coming to view. Also there is a motto: "God is the light of the heavens and the earth," a beautiful parallel to John's words: "And the life was the light of men."

When he marked out the foundations of the earth,
Then I was by him, as a Master Workman,
And I was daily his delight.
Rejoicing always before him. (Read Prov. 8:4; 8:22-30).

As in a palace in Rome, the masterpiece of Guido Reni, painted on the lofty ceiling, where it can be seen only by bending the neck in a painful posture, is brought down for prolonged study by a mirror that fully reproduces its wonderful beauty of color and figure, so the "Holy Wisdom" that was in heaven with God in unapproach-ble glory, has been brought near to us in "the Word made flesh to dwell among us."

2. Christ's Heavenly Life. And the Word was with God, and the Word was God, the same was in the beginning with God. We can never truly appreciate the meaning of Christmas, unless we think of it, not as the usual lowly beginning of a great man, but, as the unparalleled condescension of the great God. It is appropriate that, right after Christmas, we should go back, step by step, to the preceding heavenly chapters of Christ's life. (Read John 1:15; 8:58; 17:5-24; 1:18; Psa. 2:7; Heb. 1:5; II. Sam. 7:14; Heb. 2:5; Psa. 89:26-27; Psa. 97:7; Heb. 1:6; Heb. 1:8-9; Mic. 5:2; Eph. 4:10; John 6:38; Isa. 9:6). Tell me all about it says a child, "How could it be that Jesus was old before he was born in Bethlehem?" The mother takes the little hand in hers, and says: "Before you came to us, you dear, you did not live anywhere. God thought about you and so you grew. And then he thought about us, and sent you to live with us. But it was not that way with Jesus. He had been living in Heaven, longer than anybody can know, before the Heavenly Father sent him to be a little baby in the home of Mary. He had even been the helper of his Father in making the world in which we live. How wise and how strong was Jesus then! After a long while he saw that the people in this world had grown to be very wicked, and he said: 'I would like to help them to be good.' He wanted to teach even the very little ones, so he came as a little baby, and during all the time he was growing up, he showed us how we ought to live, 'going about doing good' day by day. And that was not all: he prayed that we might be forgiven all the naughty things we do, and even died upon the cross that we might be forgiven and go to heaven."

3. Christ the Creator. All things were made through him. Science shows mind in nature, manifested in design, order, and progress. The Bible declares that mind to be the mind of Christ. "The world was made by him, and the world knew him not." Nor does the world yet know Christ as its Creator, though he is proclaimed to be such twice in this chapter, twice in Hebrews, and yet again in Colossians. (Read John 1:3, 10; Heb. 1:2, 10-12; Col. 1:16, 17) Manifestly if the Apostles' Creed is to be truly apostolic, in the light of these verses, we must change one word and say: "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, through Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord." Here it is fitting to repeat what Dr. Talmage once said of Christ as the Creator: "I see now why he could open the eyes of the blind, he made the optic nerve. I see now why it was so easy for him to cure the maniac, he first created the intellect. I see now why it was so easy for him to hush the tempest, he sunk Gennesaret. I see now why it was so easy for him to swing fishes into Simon's net, he made the fish."

4. Christ's Old Testament Visits. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in the darkness, and the darkness apprehended it not. Between Creation and the first Christmas, the Son of God, the Jehovah-Jesus, prepared the way for his long visit of thirty-three years, by thirty-three short visits in an angel form, that were like morning stars before the rising of the sun. Let us find them all, but we will read one of them now. (Read Gen. 32:24-30; compare John 1:18) That the Son of God, the Jehovah-Jesus, even before he was made flesh, appeared in the form of man, gives deep significance to the divine words in Gen. 1:26: "Let us make mankind in our image, and according to our figure." The glorified spiritual body which Christ resumed after the resurrection, which could pass through closed doors, was, perhaps, the image of God in which we are made, the same spiritual image that appeared in the thirty-three theophanies.

5. "He Came Down from Heaven." He came unto his own and they received him not. Other men say, "I was born," but Jesus said, "I came down from heaven." Having looked into his heavenly life, we are prepared to appreciate Paul's ladder, more wonderful than Jacob's, the steps of condescension and ascension of him, "who, existing in the form of God, counted not the being on an equality with God, a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross." (Read Philip. 2:5-11).

Now we are ready for the first of the two great practical lessons of John's prelude, condescension for the uplift of others. How all we have seen of Christ's heavenly life helps us to understand and emulate those words about Christ, "Though he was rich, for our sakes he became poor." As he came from heaven to Bethlehem, let us rejoice to turn from glory or ease, to the service of truth and humanity.

It is said that on one occasion, Napoleon, standing before his troops, asked for one hundred men to lead a forlorn hope. He frankly told them that every man would doubtless be killed the moment the enemy opened fire. Who would dare to respond to this call and die for his Emperor? Lifting his voice, Napoleon said, "One hundred men forward! Step out of the ranks!" It is said that the whole regiment as one man, instantly sprang forward. Shall we be less responsive when Christ calls on us, not to die for him but to live for others, and himself leads the way? Let us get a motto from Peter's prompt response, when Christ bade him lower his nets after fruitless fishing:

"AT THY WORD I WILL"

Lord, I know a work is waiting
For each ransomed son of Thine,
Lo, I come in faith beseeching,
Show me mine.

Wheresoever Thou dost need me
Let Thy Spirit's guidance show,
And with loving, swift obedience
I will go.

6. "Children of God" Ourselves. As many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God. Here is the second practical lesson of this chapter. Our own sonship, which, in order of time, must precede Christian service, taught by Christ's coming down to earth. He came down to lift us up. He became a Son of man that we might be "children of God." The purpose of his incarnation is our conversion. Angels proclaim him "worthy" to be God's Son, but the only way we can be God's children, having forfeited our sonship by sin, is by "grace," that is through unmerited mercy, as he "gives us the right to be children of God." This divine sonship comes not by "blue blood" nor strong will, nor favoring physique, but only through the transforming power of God (v.13). His life is both the life and the light of men.

SLAVERY IN THE NEW HEBRIDES

THE Rev. John G. Paton, the veteran missionary to the New Hebrides, sends us this interesting letter:

Let me heartily thank you and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the $59 so kindly sent me for the work of our New Hebrides Mission. The Lord reward and bless them.

Our mission work proceeds prosperously on every island we occupy. From North Santo, where Rev. J. Robert McKenzie began his work nine years ago among the nude savages, without knowing a word of their language, he writes: "Though a few years ago the lives of many of our Christian converts were taken by the persecution of the heathen, yet by God's blessing on our Christian teaching, and the visit and display of power, and humane, kindly advice of the commander of a British man-of-war, our church work prospers. At our last half-yearly communion, 107 candidates presented themselves for examination for baptism and church membership, and after being carefully examined, 69 adults and 14 children were baptized. They with those baptized in Queensland were admitted to full church communion, when 260 sat at the Lord's table. Some of the others were delayed till they would be more perfectly instructed in Christian doctrines, and a few were rejected, whose conduct belied their profession.

"Since we landed here nine years ago, God has led us to see 1,300 heathen renounce idolatry and become Christians, and we have sent out eleven couples to help other missionaries as native teachers. Thirty miles along the coast-line now all profess to be Christians, and their home work is self-supporting. In two districts where the heathen burned down the school and teacher's house, and at his death determined to have done with Christ's teaching, they have now again applied for a teacher to be placed among them, and two villages, with a population of about fifty each, have united under a Christian chief."

So God prospers his own blessed work by our missionaries on many of our islands. But the natives generally are much excited, especially the heathen, over the inter-island kavako labor traffic, by white men, chiefly French, purchasing and kidnapping natives to take them from their own islands to sell them at so much per head to French and English traders and planters on other islands, and the natives have shot several white seamen (collectors of the laborers) in revenge. They have no protection, and no redress when they complain—wives being taken away by force from their husbands, or boys and girls taken away from their parents, to work as slaves at the mercy of their purchasers. Surely we, or any community of civilized white men in the protection of their wives and children, would also do all possible to drive off such desperadoes, yet if they kill one, usually many are shot down in revenge.

The Armenian Massacres

AUTHENTIC news of the recent massacres of Armenians has now been received. Dr. Norton, American Consul at Harpoot, writes as follows as to Sassoun, after having passed through that ill-fated province back from Bitlis to Harpoot:

"The condition is most serious. . . . The survivors of the recent massacre number nearly 10,000. They saved little but their lives. Nearly every house in the regions was completely plundered and then burned. Worst of all, their flocks and herds, practically their only source of food and raiment, as well as income, were completely swept away. The unfortunate people, after receiving, for a short period, an allowance from the government of one cent per capita and per diem for subsistence, now are without food as winter approaches them. The diseases usually following upon fright, exposure, exhaustion and insufficient food, are rapidly becoming epidemic, especially among children.

"The helplessness of this mountain folk in their need is heightened by the enforcement of administrative measures which prevent the people from leaving their ruined villages and seeking assistance or work in more favored localities. Their case is one appealing most strongly to the sympathies of the benevolent. Unless aid is rendered promptly, few may be left to receive it. The region is bare and desolate. Clothing, blankets and food must be brought from outside before the approaches to the mountains are blocked by snow.

"Several thousand destitute villagers upon the great Moush plain, adjoining the Sassoun mountains, are in sore straits."

A Burma Boy's Composition

THE following composition was sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. H. B. Benninghoff, a teacher in the A. B. M. High School at Mandalay, Burma. It was written by one of the native boys of the School. It tells its own story, and indicates the position of many who have accepted the Gospel, but who do not "deny themselves and follow Me." The paper was the result of a request by Mr. Benninghoff that the boy would take for the subject of his composition some simple incident in his experience.

Mr. Benninghoff says: "I send you the paper just as it came into my hands. The boy has been a number of years in our school. May we not pray that he will fully yield to his first thought and opinion, and that the Spirit of Power may possess his soul?"

THE CURSE OF STRONG DRINK

On Sunday morning I went to Sunday School. I was taught the curse of strong drink by our professor. Before he taught us, he asked, "What was the lessons for to-day?" We answered, "The Curse of Strong Drink." Then he wrote on the blackboard the Subject Strong Drink. After he wrote it, he read the bible Proverbs 20: 1.

It was said, "Wine is mocker, Strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. He asked us, 'how did wine deceive drunkard?' No one could answer at once, so that he wrote four points which persuaded us, namely colour, taste, effect & association. He explained us how each of them persuaded us. He gave example of a drunkard. We were very glad to hear it and we thanked him very much. It was a good lesson for us. I was asked many times by my friends to take a glass of wine, but I refused to take it. I never took even a swallow up to-day. I made up my mind that I would never take wine. Oh how afraid I am, I prayed 'May God keep away from drunkard, lead me not into temptation and make me to follow thy way.' MG. BA SEE.

THE GOSPEL AMONG SOLDIER-PRISONERS

FROM an historic and military standpoint, Alcatraz Island is one of the most famous spots on the Pacific Coast. This little island, covering less than ten acres, occupies a very conspicuous place in the magnificent bay of San Francisco, Calif. A great many years ago the island passed into the possession of the United States, when great fortifications were erected, and also a general supply station.

Later, a large military prison was erected, where all the military offenders on the Pacific Coast are kept confined serving out terms. It is one of the greatest military prisons in the United States, and as the island is composed almost entirely of stone, it is generally designated as "The Rock," a very appropriate name.

Here are confined from 300 to 400 military transgressors—men serving out terms varying from one year to life. Of course, the prisoners are coming and going all the time. Some of these prisoners are desperate, hardened criminals, but the greater number by far are not naturally vicious—only weak under temptation.

Very vigorous prison discipline is constantly maintained by the officers in charge:

but, as far as it is possible, every moral and religious influence is brought to bear on these unfortunate offenders. The purpose of the government officials is to make the prison a reformatory institution, as far as practicable. It is gratifying to chronicle that these excellent moral and religious efforts are bearing good fruit, and the influences are reaching the hearts, consciences and souls of even many sin-hardened prisoners.

Every opportunity and encouragement is afforded the men to reform. For years religious services have been held on Sundays in the prison chapel, ministers of various church denominations of San Francisco alternating in conducting the meetings. Bible readings, preaching, prayer and singing are held. The prisoners are given the warm hand of Christian fellowship, and earnestly encouraged along the pathway of reform.

One of the religious organizations of San Francisco that has zealously supplemented these reformatory efforts, is the Salvation Army, and many good seeds of Truth have been sown.

Visits are occasionally made by the several chaplains of the army and navy, to Alcatraz; also by many ladies of San Francisco, who are prominently associated with religious and temperance work. Besides these agencies, much religious, temperance, and pure, wholesome, moral literature is distributed among the prisoners, in the way of tracts, papers and books.

The action of the government is certainly worthy of the highest Christian commendation, in thus giving every encouragement to efforts that are working along the lines of reformation among the soldier-prisoners of Alcatraz Island.

The good work, long in active progress, will still be continued. J. M. B. San Francisco, Calif.

THE ISLAND MILITARY PRISON AT FORT ALCATRAZ

Adele's Christmas Letters

BY MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITHS

ALL day the Salvation Army lassie had stood on the corner of Market and Spruce Streets, supporting patiently the white banner on which, in black letters, was printed the appeal:

"Our Christmas dinner for the poor. Please help us to help others."

All day the crowds of Christmas shoppers which thronged the busy streets, had surged past in a continuous, uninterrupted stream, many of them carelessly dropping a coin in the box which the good woman held out for the purpose; others giving the pale, sweet, patient face a curious glance, multitudes sweeping by without even so much as that; and the few pausing to give with a blessing, and receiving one in return.

Crossing the crowded street, a richly dressed lady, and a little girl of possibly twelve years of age, approached the corner where the patient philanthropist stood. The banner caught the eye of the little girl at once. A sweeping glance took in the whole, and a tender light fell on her beautiful face as she touched her mother's arm.

"Mamma," said she, softly, "do you see? The Salvation Army want help in giving their Christmas dinner to the poor. Won't you give something?"

The lady gave a hurried, annoyed glance at the supporter of the banner, and said, rather irritably: "Why, no, Adele. I have no money to waste on such nonsense. Come along. Don't loiter and get mixed in with the crowd."

"But, mamma," urged the child earnestly, "it is not nonsense; it is beautiful. Isn't it the really right way to keep Christmas—to remember the poor? You know what Christ said: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least, ye have done it unto me.' Please give something, mamma. I cannot bear to have you pass by and give nothing." And the beautiful eyes, wet with unshed tears, were raised pleadingly to her mother's face.

"You absurd child!" laughed the careless mother, pulling her dress loose from her little daughter's clasp; "quoting Scripture on the street! If you are so very benevolently inclined, give a penny yourself." And again the light laugh, which was almost a sneer, grated on the child's sensitive ear.

But she was too greatly in earnest to give up her point, and the crowd being so dense as to impede their progress, she seized the opportunity to make one more plea.

"Why, mamma," she said, the tears in her voice as well as her eyes, "I haven't even a penny; you know I haven't. You wouldn't let me bring any money because you said you couldn't attend to my Christmas shopping to-day; so I left my purse at home. If you will give the lady a quarter, mamma, I'll pay you just as soon as I get home; I will, indeed."

"A quarter! Are you crazy, Adele?" said the mother, now out of all patience. "Once for all, I have no quarter to throw away. If the Salvation Army undertakes to do these things, they must get through with them as best they can. I presume they make money at it or they wouldn't do it; there generally is money at the bottom of these schemes. They certainly get a great deal more than the dinner will cost. Now, don't stop again; here is a break in the crowd; push through and stop at LaMonts'." And putting her little girl in front of her, she thrust her forward until they entered the large department store she was seeking.

Adele was crying; she could not help it; but she did not want her mother, or anyone else, in fact, to witness her emotion, and she hastily pulled her large hat with its drooping plumes, further over her face, and wiped away the tears as fast as they appeared. Happily, her mother was soon so occupied with her purchases, that the child was wholly unnoticed, and she wandered back to the big entrance doors, and finally stepped outside. There was a fascination to her not to be resisted, in the Salvation Army lassie and the big white banner. She looked longingly toward the corner of Market and Spruce Streets. Yes, there she was, still standing, her sweet face radiating a heavenly light, smiling at occasional donors, such a smile—a Christmas blessing in itself!

"She looks exactly as if she were standing up for Jesus," thought Adele, gazing at her raptly. "And she is. She really is! Oh, how cold her poor feet must be, in spite of that piece of carpet she is standing on. I do wish I had some money to give her. I'd like to give her every cent of my five dollars, instead of buying foolish little presents with it for folks that don't know what to do with them after they get them. I paid a dollar and a half for a vase for Aunt Nell, just last Christmas, and she had so many she stuck it away, and finally gave it to her washwoman to pay for the washing. It made me mad; I do hate such things. Mamma, and papa, and Aunt Nell, and Uncle Bob, don't need a single thing, and I know they won't care for what I buy them. Oh, of course, they'll make a big fuss; but they have so many pretty things now, it is just a waste to try to get them anything, and a worry beside. I have a notion to—yes, I will, I will!" And she ran down the big stone steps and made her way to where the Salvation lassie still stood.

"Please, ma'am," she said, lifting her sweet face earnestly, "will you be here to-morrow?"

"Oh, yes, my dear," was the reply, "for several to-morrows; either I or some one of the company."

"Oh, I am so glad!" said the little girl, threading her way back through the crowd which was now thinning fast, and re-entering the store. Her mother was still busy and had not missed her. She found her way to the stationery counter and began to examine the dainty boxes of pretty paper and envelopes.

"Would you like to purchase something?" asked the pleasant saleslady.

"Not to-day, thank you," said Adele; "I am not prepared. I may come in again to-morrow." Then her mother called her and she hastened away.

That evening, she was resting on the arm of her father's chair with her arm about his neck, while her mother told the story of her purchases. "Someway," Mrs. Esmond was saying, "I never feel satisfied with my Christmas shopping. There is so much to buy, and I almost always get what I do not want after all."

"Is that the way with you, little daughter?" asked Mr. Esmond, fondly smoothing the bright hair resting on his shoulder.

"It has been," said the child, thoughtfully, "but I do not want it to be so this year, papa. I should like to make some really good Christmas presents and not give silly things. Might I do just as I like with my money, papa, and not tell anybody how I am spending it? Would you be willing to trust me to get my presents all by myself this time, mamma, and not ask a single question? I have thought of something to give my friends this year a little different, but I do not want anyone to know, please."

"Isn't she the most absurd child?" said Mrs. Esmond. "Such ridiculous fancies as she has in her head."

"Isn't she the most precious child?" said her father, kissing her and drawing her closer to him. "Why, to be sure, darling, do just as you please with your money. It is your own; no one may presume to say how you shall spend it. We will agree to respect your pretty little secret."

Permission thus obtained, Adele set off the next morning for LaMonts' big store.

There she purchased the very handsomest box of stationery she could find, and then, going to the corner of Market and Spruce Streets, she dropped the balance of her money into the box for the poor. The Salvation Army lassie flashed upon her a smile like one of the sunbeams of heaven, and said in a voice that thrilled her heart: "The Lord bless you, my dear little girl."

"It is you who ought to have a blessing," softly replied Adele, speeding away with a light heart.

All the rest of the time up to Christmas Eve she was busy as a bee in her own snug little room. She wrote as many as a dozen Christmas letters, and beautiful letters they were—beautifully written and beautifully composed, with the sweetness of her fresh, young, loving heart entwined in every one, giving them the very fragrance of the hidden Christ-life within. She was exceedingly skilful with her pen, and some of them contained dainty little scrolls, and birds, and even little children's smiling faces in gold-colored ink. In others there were Christmas verses, selected with the greatest care and written in her very best style, while still others contained beautiful Christmas cards. She was longest in the preparation of the letters for her papa and mamma, writing and re-writing them several times; and, Christmas morning, when she carried them to the breakfast table and placed them by their plates, she kissed each one softly. They were very much alike, and we will take the liberty of reading Mrs. Esmond's:

"My Dearest Mamma: Will you be surprised and disappointed at receiving only a letter for your Christmas present from your dear little Adele? Please be patient, dearest mamma, and I will explain. There are two reasons why I make this kind of a gift: First, because it is the very best I have to offer, for indeed, dear mamma, it is filled full of the love that is in my heart for you, and money, you know, cannot buy that. Everything I could think of getting for you seemed so poor and foolish. I knew you would care little or nothing for it, and that any regard you might have for it would only be because of the love that prompted the gift; but the letter, dearest mamma, you can always keep, and if ever I should go away from you, you can read it over sometimes, and it will seem almost as if I am still with you; for my heart is with you, dearest mamma, and always will be.

"The other reason is, that I feel that my money ought to be given to Jesus, not only because it is his very own birthday, and he ought to be remembered in every way a great deal more than anybody, but he has said so much about the poor being his especial care, and how he wants those who profess to love him to remember them and do all they can for them, and then he knows just how to take the money and bless it and make it a blessing. Just like he once took the loaves and the fishes, dearest mamma, and fed a whole multitude with them. Indeed, dear mamma, try as hard as I might, I could not help seeing that lovely Christ-like Salvation Army lady holding up the banner with 'Please help us to help others' on it; it seemed almost as if it was Jesus himself standing there so patiently, and asking me to help feed the poor. And I could not help it, dearest mamma, indeed, I could not; I had to give my money to Him, and so I did.

"And now, darling mamma, I do wish you the dearest, sweetest and merriest Christmas you ever had in all your life! And I do ask that whenever you think of me, you will pray God to make me more like the Christ-child every day and every year. Always your own little girl,

"ADELE ESMOND."

The effect of these letters can be better imagined than described. Mr. Esmond rose from his place at table, and coming round to his little daughter, clasped her tightly in his arms, saying, huskily, that her gift was the most beautiful one he had ever received. As for Mrs. Esmond, she could not command her feelings, but excused herself and left the room in tears. Later in the day Mr. Esmond proposed that they all go to the big banqueting hall where the Salvation Army were to give the dinner, and watch the poor partake of their Christmas feast; and as they stood and looked at the more than four hundred guests come marching in, received as royally as if they were clothed in purple and fine linen, saw their famished faces glow with gratitude and love, and heard them join in the grand old doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," their hearts had never been so stirred. It was with a wild throb of joy that Adele saw her mother touch her father's arm and whisper to him, and in response he took out his check-book, filled out a check, and placed it in the Captain's hand. The child's soft hand crept into her mother's.

"Mamma," she whispered, as they turned to leave the hall, "It has been the loveliest Christmas I ever knew. It seems just as if Christ was everywhere."

Mrs. Esmond pressed the little hand convulsively. Well she knew that it was because Christ, the "hope of eternal glory," was the "Hidden Man" of her child's heart.

To Help the Deserving Poor

THE New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor has issued an appeal for aid for the deserving poor at the Christmas season. It says:

In New York tenements are hundreds of sick and crippled and the unbefriended, who are unable to go out upon the streets, into churches and clubs for their share of Christmas cheer. Christmas must come to them. Have you ever thought how happy a special shoe, cork-soled, would make a lame girl? Or how pleased a poor old man of eighty years would be with a pair of eye-glasses? Or what a warm dressing-gown would mean to a consumptive man compelled to live on the sixth floor, rear, in a New York tenement? Did Santa Claus ever do anything more beautiful than pay a grocery bill of $10, to enable an overworked widow trying to support four children, to start the new year free? The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor knows intimately the needs of nearly two thousand families, who owe their distress to accident, to death, to causes beyond their own control. A few special needs are mentioned, in the hope that among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be found some generous Santa Claus.

For a widow's family, a high chair and crib for the baby, a substantial dinner, two suits of clothes for the little boys.

For a family of little girls, material for school dresses, brushes, combs, tooth-brushes, warm coats and caps.

For an elderly woman living alone, who loves flowers, a growing plant.

For a grandmother over eighty years old, house slippers and knitted shawl.

Sweaters for two delicate little boys.

A go-cart for a tired mother of two heavy babies.

A rolling chair for an invalid mother who cannot walk.

For a mother and baby who have been ill, outside clothing.

Rent for a widow and three young children, to prevent the mother from overworking and breaking down.

For a family of children just recovering from scarlet fever, new school dresses, a tree, games, books and toys.

For a young girl and her grandmother, both ill, a cot, two comfortable, a supply of milk and fresh eggs for several weeks and some Christmas stories.

For three children whose father died last summer, coats, mittens and hats, and some simple mechanical toys.

Gifts will be acknowledged through this paper and by personal notes from Robert Shaw Minturn, Treasurer, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

Better than Last Year

The Crown Dictionary is especially acceptable to elderly eyes, for clearness of type, for size, and for convenience of handling. As regards the Calendar, though that of last year was handsome, I like this year's much better.

To Make Cheerless Homes Happy

BY MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH

AS the Christmas season approaches, it becomes the ever-brightening centre of joyous expectation to the little ones in our happy homes, to whom Christ's birthday is the very height of festivity, bringing home reunions, joyous parties, pleasures and gifts. Yet to many throughout our country, it holds forth not only no promise of good things to be looked forward to, but appears an even darker and drearier day than most, because of the contrast in their poor homes to the preparations seen on every hand.

The Volunteers will in many cities dine the hungry in their halls, send baskets of food to the poor tenements, and plan treats for the children, but this special fund for which I appeal is to meet the need that can only be reached in a more personal manner. In the Volunteer Prison League Department we are in touch with hundreds of those whose husbands and fathers have come under our influence in prison. Through these men we have been introduced to their families, and they turn to us in their hour of dire need as personal friends. We strive as far as possible to take Christmas into each home, and yet to make the Christmas help such as will last for many a day afterwards. We find in many instances that the mother, by her toil, can only just keep the rent paid and provide a meagre supply of food for her little ones. Were it not for the help we give in clothing these children, they would in many instances be unable to go to school. Our Christmas gifts are not intended only to gladden the day, but to practically lift the burden that shadows the morrow. We have lists made out from our books, which enable us to know the age, sex, and, as far as possible, the size of each child. We give to these little ones warm, serviceable clothing, two pair of stockings, and often shoes. Some article of clothing is added for the mother. We provide groceries, a chicken or turkey, and money for fuel and vegetables. From our friends we have received dolls and toys to pass on to these little ones, and we also fill the Santa Claus stockings with good things.

Last year I went myself through the downtown tenement district on the wagon to distribute the parcels to many of these families. I saw not only the dire need and poverty, but the heart-touching gratitude and appreciation of these brave, struggling women. One call was at an attic in a rear tenement. Up, up, up, we climbed with the narrow winding of the crooked stairs, to be met on the last flight by a tiny, ragged boy. He was so small and forlorn that one might have expected a woebegone face to peep from the tangled hair; but the black eyes shone radiantly, and his little mouth was smiling rapturously, for he was welcoming Santa Claus. The mother welcomed me in the tiny room under the eaves. It was hardly bigger than a prison cell. Under a chair in the corner, amid some kindling wood and rubbish, sat the baby, clothed in one thin little garment. There was no bed that I could see as I sat on the only seat near the stove, that seemed to fill the narrow space. I found on inquiry that it was folded up against the wall; and had it not been tucked away, the mother and children would have had no room to move around. When first found by us, this woman was living in a damp cellar, and the youngest child was then a tiny babe. They were starving. Their condition was certainly better this year, and that could be said of almost all the families whom we had previously helped, but the Christmas gifts were sorely needed.

Another family that we went to seek we failed to find, for on that Christmas eve they had been dispossessed, and it was not until some days afterwards that we could trace them and give them their Christmas gifts. Early this summer the father came home, and we found for him a position. He has done well and worked steadily ever since, and this Christmas, with his wife and little girls, he is settled in a comfortable home, and will be able to insure for them a happy day.

Whatever the world may feel concerning the men in prison, for whom I work, all with any pity or compassion must entertain the deepest sympathy for these innocent sufferers.

May I appeal to your readers to help me with gifts of money, clothing, groceries or toys? Anything and everything will be acceptable. All such donations should be addressed to Mrs. Ballington Booth, Volunteers of America, 38 Cooper Square, New York City. At this, of all seasons, may it not be truly said by the One whose birthday we commemorate, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me?"

Famine Feared in Russia

A cable dispatch to the New York Sun, states that the terrible strain imposed by the war on the internal resources of Russia, has brought central Russia into hunger's grip. Desperate bread riots are reported in more than a hundred districts, and the peasantry are dying of starvation by scores. If the strain continues much longer they will die by thousands. There is piteous distress even in Moscow. Black bread has risen twenty per cent in price. Rioting is feared, and the troops are kept on the alert. The price of bread has trebled at Tver and quintupled at Uglich. The unceasing demands of the government and the corruption of the tax collectors are driving the people to madness. Many have been killed and wounded by the soldiers in suppressing organized food riots.

Christmas Voices

CHRISTMAS-BELLS are ringing,
High in steeples swinging,
Gloriously singing
Of the New-born King;
Of the world's salvation,
Of the new creation,
Which the Christ doth bring.

Whilst thus bells are chiming,
And glad echoes timing
Music, joy and rhyming,
Angels come to earth.
Christmas-carols singing,
Christ to men are bringing Heralds of his birth.

Angels' songs, united
Here with undivided,
Harmony-benighted
Earthly chimes of love,
Make the hearts of creatures,
Make their human features
More like God's above.

Christmas-chimes forever!
God and man can sever,
Earth nor Hades never!
God is love—is love!
Christmas-bells be swinging,
Men and children singing,
Carol it angels above!

WHITE: Just as soon as cold weather sets in, my hands roughen and crack. I buy the best and most expensive soap my druggist has, but the result is just the same—sore hands every winter.

BROWN: I had just the same experience until I read one of the Ivory Soap advertisements about too much alkali in some soaps, which draws the natural oil from the skin, and leaves it dry and liable to crack, so I sent out and got a cake of Ivory Soap, and since then my hands have been soft and smooth the year round.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Brockville, Ont., Can. No doubt many individuals are praying daily that the awful war in the East may soon end, but would it be inconsistent if the whole Christian Church of this continent fixed a day, or series of days, for special pleading in this behalf? Some may say this war will result in much good some day for the cause of Christ. This may all be true; but surely there is a better way. God is not pleased with the awful butchery that is now going on. Through your paper you can influence others to take the matter up, and arrange for special days of prayer. God will not turn a deaf ear to the millions of his children if in one accord.

We should be pleased to hear the views of our readers on this suggestion. As the Church is largely to blame for encouraging war, and praising military prowess, it would be a welcome sign to see it turn toward peace. True Christians everywhere would suffer wrong, rather than resort to violence, but what is to be expected when we hear warlike sentiments proclaimed from the pulpit, and when the slaughter of men is invested with "glory," when it ought to be everywhere deplored.

Benoni F. H., Moran, Kans. Please inform me where the name, Ben-oni is found in the Bible?

See Gen. 35:18. It was the name given by Rachel to her second son. The word means "Son of my sorrow."

J. A. F., Anamosa, Ia. If Christ had descended from the cross when he was challenged to do so, what would have been the effect on the world? Would the miracle have convinced them?

That he did not do so, is sufficient for us.
What might have been the effect is not worth consideration. Doubtless those who challenged him would not have been convinced under any circumstances. Their request was intended as a taunt. As in the temptation in the wilderness, Christ would not work a miracle in his own behalf. In the hour of his passion he was submissive, otherwise at any moment of his trial and suffering, he might have delivered himself.
He became, as it was predicted he would,
obedient unto death.

R. D., Cedar Falls, Iowa, writes:

In your Nov. 23d issue you notice "A wedding in the Clouds." Why not give a short history of the couple that were married about Nov. 1, 1865, in a balloon at the foot of Central Park? I saw the bridal car, and was up in the balloon one thousand feet the day before. The balloon was owned by Prof. Lowe, who had been with us in the army a long time with his balloon.

H. S., Wilmington, Del. I was brought up under the old regime, that nothing was too good for one's guest, and that he or she take precedence of all the household. A new style insists that the hostess should be served first. Is this really the correct custom?

At a formal dinner or banquet, the guest of honor is seated at the right of the host or hostess, and as the guests are helped down the line in order as they come, it naturally falls to the lot of the guest of honor to be served first. At an informal home dinner, ladies are served first. It is the custom in some houses to serve the lady of the house first, but there are no hard and fast rules governing this, and one is never very far out of the way in treating a guest with every courtesy, which kind hospitality suggests.

W. H. A., Washington, D. C. 1. Is it a fact that the Vedas, or ancient writing of India, contain an account of Creation, fall of man, flood, laws of sacrifices, laws of purification, unclean animals, etc.? 2. Is the following named book reliable, The Unknown Life of Christ, from an ancient manuscript, recently discovered (1894) in a Buddhist monastery, by Nicholas Notovitch?

1. Hinduism, in its sacred books, presents two views as to the Creation. The Naiya-yikas advocate the atomic theory of the universe, and recognize the work of a personal Creator, called Is-wara, who made all things and gave to man a soul (Jiva).
The Sankhyas repudiate the idea of a personal Creator and hold that the atoms themselves were capable of forming a universe. These are only two of the many subtle forms assumed by Hindu belief.
Prof. Manilal N. d'Vivedi, before the World's Congress of Religions, stated that Hinduism holds God to be formless and all-pervading, not personal; that creation is a question of evolution; that every being is by nature immortal, but that personal immortality or the immortality of the soul is unimaginable; that the only revelation of God is in his works; that original sin, the fall, etc., are only terms of relative experience, and that every one can work out his own salvation. The ancient writings of India contain very little that would furnish a basis of comparison with Christianity or even with Judaism. 2. The book or MS. by Notovitch, said to have been discovered in a Tibetan monastery in Lhasa is rejected by eminent scholars. It was so stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago.

E. P. Oxford, Pa. Is not faith in Christ all that is necessary to salvation? Are not baptism, good works, mere accessories?

A good tree is known by its fruits. If a man declares that he has faith in Christ, and yet does not obey him, we doubt whether his faith is genuine. Faith saves —that is true, but no man can really be trusting in Christ, and yet be living in sin.
Such faith would be idle. The real faith is eager for service, is so full of love and gratitude, that it strives to do all that Christ requires, seeks holiness and delights to obey him in all things. A faith that does not affect character and conduct is spurious.

Mrs E. P., Tampico, Mex., writes:

I noticed one of your correspondents inquires about the practice of pouring oil upon the troubled waters. I am indebted to Mr. T. J. Hunt of Rutledge, Pa., for the information, which he kindly gave me eleven years ago. The practice was first mentioned by the younger Pliny as one of the customs of the Greek sailors. Dioscorides, a medical writer living before Christ, promulgated the theory that if castor oil were hung on a tree near a tempest, the tempest would subside. In English literature, the venerable Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History mentions it. In more modern times, Benjamin Franklin advanced the theory in an address before the Philosophical Society. Jules Verne also refers to the subject in one or more of his books.

H. E. M., Georgetown, S. C. 1. Was circumcision ever practised by Gentiles? 2. On what is the doctrine of Infant Baptism founded? 3. Why was John the Baptist so called? 4. Why did Jesus come to the River Jordan to be baptized?

1. Yes; by the Arabs, and they still keep up the practice. 2. On the principle of dedication. The parents dedicate their child to Christ, but Baptists contend that is not the true principle of the ordinance.
3. Because of the practice not unknown to the Jews, but never applied so generally as John applied it. 4. His own explanation was doubtless true, that it became him to fulfil all righteousness. In other words, taking his place under the law, a public renunciation of sin.

L. D. McC., Paterson, N. J. Who wrote the poem which begins:

"Farewell, proud world. I'm going home?"

It was written by Ralph Waldo Emerson, in 1824, before he took up his residence in Concord.

D. W. C., Champion, Pa. Did Jeroboam intentionally lead his people into idolatry?

His primary object in setting up the calves was to prevent his people going to Jerusalem to worship. He thought if they went there, they would give up their allegiance to him. He provided them with an object of worship nearer home, and so led his people into idolatry.

C. C., Cavalier, N. Dak. The crops in our State have fallen short this year. In many instances, if the debts and expenses were paid, there would not be a dollar margin. Should a person who conscientiously practices tithing omit this year his usual offering?

This is one of the difficulties of the tithing system, a survival of the legal system of the Jewish dispensation. In establishing the system, the law was that the increase alone should be tithed (see Deut.
14: 28). If there has been no increase, no tithe is due. The Christian, however, who is not under the law, may find the means for a voluntary offering, but under the circumstances you mention it ought to be small. Just debts or unavoidable expenses ought to be paid first. We have no right to offer to God money that belongs to our creditors.

T. M. G., Lamb, Va. Why did Christ forbid giving that which was holy to the dogs (Matt. 7: 6)?

The Gospel was not to be pressed on men who definitely rejected it. There are men so wedded to their sins, so incapable of realizing the beauty of a holy life, that it is wasted effort to preach to them. They are like dogs, who cannot comprehend a higher life.

S. H., Palmyra, Tenn. Where can I procure the book which has the poem, "The Peri and the Angel," in it?

The poem on "The Peri at the Gate of Paradise" is by Moore, and will be found in any edition of his works.

F. A. C., Brooklyn, N. Y. Our courts would not recognize the validity of any Papal annulment of a marriage. They would deal with it as with a civil contract. The parties should consult a lawyer.

Emma C. C., Gibbstown, N. J. Will you kindly tell me the author of the beautiful poem beginning,

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned.

The author is Mrs. May Riley Smith.

* L., Conington, Pa. 1. If the death of Christ was necessary, why were Pilate and the Jews to blame? 2. What is meant by the petition in the Lord's prayer, Lead us not into temptation? Does God lead his people into temptation? 3. Why did the man in the Gospels ask Christ to help his unbelief? 4. Why does the Old Testament say nothing about a future life?

1. They were not coerced. They were free agents. Every act of theirs proved that had they been so disposed they could have released Jesus. They could not escape responsibility by any such plea. 2. God never tempts any man (see James 1: 13). A better rendering would be, "Abandon us not in temptation." The word is used in the sense of trial or testing. Peter experienced the need of such a prayer when, after having boastfully declared that though all men should deny Christ, yet would not he, he denied him thrice. 3. He tried to believe, yet could not wholly. In his deficiency he begged Christ to help. He begged him to enable him to believe. 4. It does, inferentially. Balaam prayed that he might die the death of the righteous, which implied an after life. David expects to rejoin his dead child. In Psalm 17 he says he will be satisfied when he awakes in God's likeness. Asaph, in Psalm 73, hopes that after death God will receive him to glory. Isaiah says (26: 19), "Thy dead men shall live." Job expects that without his flesh he will see God (Job 19: 25). Daniel believed that "the multitude of them that sleep shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and contempt" (Daniel 12: 2, 3).

C. M. J., Cedar Rapids, Ia., writes:

Would answer Louisa A. M.'s question by saying, Wages and Unemployment, was written I think, soon after Little Women was published, but it was not so popular as Miss Olcott's other works, hence not so well known.

THE "PRISON-GATE MISSION"

THE Prison-Gate Mission has established its headquarters at No. 192 Elm Street, New York City, a short distance from the Tombs Prison, and in the immediate neighborhood of the Criminal Courts. At a recent meeting of the founders of the Mission, an organization was effected as follows: Rev. John B. Devins, Editor N. Y. Observer, Chairman; Rev. John J. Munro, Superintendent; Andrew A. Knowles, Esq., of the Mechanics' National Bank of New York, Treasurer.

On the Board of Managers are Mr. Jacob A. Riis, the well-known author and philanthropist; Mr. John Willis Baer, Dr. F. W. Robinson, Mr. Henry D. Dickson, of the New York Y. M. C. A., and Geo. H. Sandison, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The object of the Prison-Gate Mission, is to aid men who have just been released from prison, and to encourage them in the effort to lead honest and industrious lives; to help them to shun drunkenness and criminal companions; to find them employment, and to induce Christian employers of labor, and others who are in sympathy with this work of rescue and restoration, to co-operate by providing work for the men, wherever possible. It is hoped that in this way, many generous-hearted employers may be found who will be willing, each in his own way as opportunity offers, to take up as his cross or personal work for the Master, the case of some poor out-cast from society, and try to lead him to a better life.

It is estimated that fully one-half of all the inmates of our prisons are offenders who, after their first crime, have tried to find honest work, but have failed, and were drawn back into sinful courses be-

1. L. D., Lewiston, N. Y. 1. How old was Jesus when he was crucified? 2. Will the world be destroyed by fire? 3. How were the nations originally organized?

1. From the somewhat indefinite statements in the Gospels it is inferred that he was about thirty-three years and four month old. 2. So Peter says (See II. Peter 3: 10). Some have thought that he means it will be purified by fire and become the habitation of the redeemed. 3. By companies of the original nations immigrating and settling in unoccupied or newly discovered lands.

NEW BOOKS

An Artist's Influence

Thomas Nast, His Period and His Pictures, by Albert Bigelow Paine. This is a notable book and is much more than a mere memoir. It deals with one who was the foremost caricaturist in his day and who made his pencil a power in city, state and nation. The triumph of Nast's art was the triumph of decency, of honesty in politics, of high principle in public affairs. He never used it for an evil purpose nor degraded it to mercenary ends. He probably did more to create healthy, honest, public opinion, than any writer or artist of his time. New York and the nation owe him a debt of gratitude for the magnificent work he did in helping to expose and overthrow the Tammany Ring. Mr. Paine has given us a capital story of the life and work of this wonderful artist, and the best examples of his art are all to be found in this volume of nearly 600 large pages. Copiously illustrated. Cloth binding; top gilt. Price $5. The Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

A Tale by Ralph Connor

The Prospector, a Tale of the Crown's Nest Country, by Ralph Connor, author of The Sky Pilot, Black Rock, etc. The story deals with the days when the mining country was peopled but sparsely and by the usual motley crowd of prospectors, cowboys, and fortune hunters. Into this wild, free-and-easy country, Ralph Connor introduces an Eastern college graduate—an athlete and a "man's man" always. He sacrifices home and friends and mother at the altar of stern duty, but never does he lose a spark of his sterling manhood. He introduces to these Westerners a necessary muscular Christianity in defense of the weak or upholding the right. Pp. 401. Cloth covers. Price $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago and Toronto, publishers.

The Santa Claus Myth

Is there a Santa Claus? by Jacob A. Riis. A dainty volume, prettily illustrated, written in answer to a boy's question. Mr. Riis answers the question by saying: "Santa Claus is the spirit of Christmas, and ever so many years ago when the dear Child was born after whom we name Christmas. That spirit came into the world to soften the hearts of men and make them love one another. Therefore, that is the mark of the spirit to this day." Pp. 29. Price 75 cents. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York.

The Progress of China

New Forces and Old in China, by Rev. Arthur W. Brown. A NOTABLE CALENDAR

The 250-Year Calendar, for every year between 1762 and 1912, is probably the most remarkable and comprehensive calendar ever published, and will prove of very general interest, besides affording much amusement in answering all questions domestic, national and historic. The student, scholar, doctor, lawyer, clergyman, will also find it valuable in their work. It is very simple, and is so ingeniously and cleverly arranged that by turning the wheel on the back of the calendar, any year that may be desired will appear through an opening at the top, giving the calendar for that year together with the date for Easter Sunday. This useful and ornamental calendar ought to be very popular. Size 13 1/4 by 10 1/4 inches; price 25 cents; published by W. H. McIntyre, 221 Pearsall Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

Life and Light

By MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR Lord Jesus Christ is introduced to us in the Gospel of Matthew by a genealogy, as befits him who was born King of the Jews: in Mark, by his work in helping the suffering and needy as the Servant and Sacrifice; in Luke, by his family surroundings, according to his presentation as Son of Man in that Gospel. But John, who sets him forth as Son of God, introduces him as the eternal Son. "The beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. 3, R.V.), the First-born of all creation (Col. 1: 15, R.V.). "The Lord possessed me as the Beginning of his way; the first of his works of old. I was poured out from everlasting from the beginning, or ever the earth was" (Prov. 8: 22, 23, R.V. marg.). And thus the Man who was given to see into the future in his Revelation, further than any other, was also given to see farther into past eternity than any other. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God." In the vain attempts made in these days to prove that the Word of God is not reliable, simply because the finite can not comprehend the Infinite, men are seeking to do away with all that is miraculous in the Word of God, and to reduce it to the level of a man-made book, which can be mastered by human intellect.

To do this honestly, the Gospel of John must go, for it is full of the Godhead of Christ, from beginning to end. Professor Newell says, after remarking how, in the Gospel of John, we are shown the essential Deity of Christ, that we are not only asked to see and hear him, as in the three other Gospels, we are in St. John commanded to believe. The word believe, or its equivalent, occurs nearly a hundred times in John's brief book. In John 20: 30, 31, the object of this Gospel is definitely stated by the Spirit: "Many other signs, therefore, did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book, but these are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life through his name."

It is not enough to assent to his Jewish Messiahship, as Matthew sets it forth; nor to admire, and even strive to imitate, his life of service, as Mark portrays it, nor to call him the perfect Man, according to Luke. We must accept at heart his Deity, and we must accept him as the Sent One to us,—the Christ of God. I must risk my eternity in his hands, I must rest on the work he has done, and on himself as the Doer of it."

"All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." We are reminded of that magnificent description of the creation in Prov. 8: 27-30, where Christ is the speaker: "When he established the heavens, I was there: when he set a circle upon the face of the deep: when he made firm the skies above: when the fountains of the deep became strong: when he gave to the sea its bound, that the waters should not transgress his commandment: when he marked out the foundations of the earth, then I was by him, as a Master Workman."

The apostle Paul tells us that in him "were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions, or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him, and he is before all things, and in him all things consist" (Col. 1: 16, 17, R.V.). And this is confirmed by Heb. 1: 3, where it is stated that he upholds all things by the Word of his power.

This, then, is he on whom we are asked, yes, commanded, to believe, that he is the Christ, the Son of God, and our own personal Saviour, who, "when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. 1: 3). He asks of us a personal, individual faith, without which no Bible knowledge, nor any other knowledge can save us from "the wrath to come." We have seen that in him all things consist, or "hold together," and now we learn that in him was life. Sin brought death into the world. There is no antidote to death but life, and our beloved Lord came amongst us, and now represents us as our fellow-Man at the right hand of God, as "the Resurrection and the Life" (John 11: 25).

These Beautiful Instruments are the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs, and are confidently offered to the public. These musical wonders use no paper, but music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins. These pins operate upon valve keys, made of hard steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on metal castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these grand instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music. They will play Hymns and Popular Airs, with a clearness and accuracy, and degree of execution which but few performers can equal. A mere child can play them. They have the carrying quality of a Large Pipe Organ, and are the only instruments that will render slow and sacred music with a powerful, sustaining organ tone. They will play tunes as long as desired, without any break, instead of stopping to change the piece, as must be done with organettes. They are beautifully finished in solid walnut. The reeds are organ size, and the volume of tone will fill a hall. They are Genuine Musical Instruments, which anyone can play, without teacher or practice, and which good musicians can recommend. The price is nothing compared with their intrinsic value. They are equal in every way to a $50 Music Box, so far as the quality of the music is concerned, and also in point of construction, finish, and decoration. This organ is the most simple, perfect, marvelous, instructive, enjoyable, and amusing musical instrument in the world. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, it is just what is wanted. It will play all the sacred music, and as many verses as desired, without stopping to replace the music roller. This great advantage no other instrument has. By this means, a result is attained that was never reached before.

President McKinley's last words

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on application.

MOTHER AND CHILDREN IN A CANNING FACTORY

THREE LITTLE CHILD SLAVES

LIKE GANGS OF TINY SLAVES, THEY STAND AND SWEAT

THE LITTLE SLAVES OF TOIL

A MOVEMENT TO COUNTERACT THE EVILS OF CHILD LABOR IN NEW YORK

MANY thousands of New York children of tender years are engaged illegally in various forms of labor at the present time. They are robbed of their childhood, stunted in growth, deprived of educational opportunities and ruined in health and, too often, in morals also.

The New York Child Labor Committee, represented by Mr. Mornay Williams, Dr. Ernest J. Lederle and Mr. Robert Hunter, had a hearing before the Governor-elect, for the purpose of protesting against the re-appointment of the present Labor Commissioner, on the ground that his inefficiency was such as almost to render useless the present laws for the protection of children. They presented photographs of children five, six and seven years of age working in the factories of the State. The chairman of the delegation said that there were hundreds of children under the legal age working in all portions of the State, and the Bureau of Labor was making very little effort to enforce the law. In 1902, children were found employed in violation of the law in 2,607 factories, but only five firms employing these children illegally were prosecuted.

A special inquiry was made by the Child-Labor Committee into conditions prevailing in one of the important industries up-State. In one factory a child of four years was found at work; in another, a child of five; in another, one of six, who worked until nine in the evening. In one factory alone, the man in charge of the shed estimated the children under fourteen to number three hundred all working in violation of law. In the busy season they worked until two and three o'clock in the morning. The Chairman of the Committee said he and his associates were surprised to find these evils in New York State, and it had begun to believe that the conditions were little better than those said to exist in the South. They urged upon the Governor-elect the importance of the enforcement of the laws. The trade-unions are, without exception, in favor of the abolition of child labor.

Reports made to the Child Labor Committee by its special agents, contain some startling revelations. In a factory at Syracuse, N. Y., the assistant foreman said that "wee little ones" (and he made a motion with his hand to about the height of his knee), had been at work, and said with glee that their little hands were just right. They very seldom saw an inspector. At another factory, elsewhere, mothers and children sat in long rows at work. A few were Italians, but most were Americans of good village or farm stock. One woman said she and her children worked from 9 A.M., to 9 P.M., daily, except Saturday. Another group included a mother and her children, whose ages were as follows: "Elsie Pearl, four years' old; Earl, three years' old in February." The woman said: "I am so sorry Will isn't here.

In still another factory there were found ten boys under fourteen, working in a packing room. One little lad of five years said: "I work in the factory. Ain't doing nothin' much to-day. Made fifty cents yesterday." Another boy of this group was aged six.

At another place there were a number of small girls not over eleven or twelve years' old. They go to the factory at seven o'clock in the morning. One boy of twelve had worked for three years in the factory. He can scarcely write his name, and is unable to read or to do simple sums. This year only three boys out of ten of his playmates have gone back to school, and it is the same with the girls. This boy's story is a typical one.

At still another place the visitors found three boys and three girls hardly over twelve years' old, but the foreman said that during the summer they employed children seven and eight years' old, with their parents. He said, "Of course they must have their children with them in order to keep the law." The hours are from seven in the morning till nine or ten at night, as a rule, but the factory runs till twelve, and is sometimes open until three A.M. It also was in operation two Sundays this summer. Ten hours is the usual period of work, but variations up to fifteen are quite frequent. Wages vary from five cents for the small boys, to seven cents for the women and girls.

Chairman Hunter, of the Child Labor Committee, writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning these little slaves of toil, says:

"We have got our laws, but they are not enforced. These laws are, as you know, as vital to the welfare of the State as are the tenement-house laws. They protect the workers in their homes and the workers in the factories. Both the labor laws and the tenement-house laws are sanitary ones, aiming in all cases, I believe, to protect the health, the life and limbs of people employed in all industries. It is lamentable that this work should be considered unimportant, and that any person who may happen to be a successful politician is considered fit to do this important service for the community. The efforts of our Committee are now bent toward the one end of obtaining a person fully equipped and capable to bring to this work ability, fearlessness, energy and honest purpose."

BABY TOILERS IN A NEW YORK STATE FACTORY

He is seven, but he gets tired. I left him home sick."

At another factory, the foreman said, in answer to a question about the length of time the children worked: "Yes, they stay as long as their mothers, from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. It is all the same. Fine lot, aren't they? That little one of three, there, can't do much to count. Inspectors? Yes, they're awful strict. Well, they have been twice, but they dassen't say nothing about this place. They dassen't say a word."

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS

A NEW SERMON BY DR. ROBERT STUART MAC ARTHUR

Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York. Text: Luke 2: 14, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men." Or, New Version, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased."

IN Norway, especially in the vicinity of the North Cape, when the long night of winter is nearing its close, many of the people, dressed in holiday attire, stand on the tops of mountains awaiting the first glimpse of the returning sun. The moment it is seen, embracing one another, they exclaim: "Behold the sun!" From mountain top to mountain top the cry goes over parts of the country: "Behold the sun! Behold the sun!" Jesus Christ is the Sun of Righteousness. Noble hearts and longing souls who waited for the "Consolation of Israel," greeted his advent with songs of joy. We thus have the "Benedictus" of Zacharias, the "Magnificat" of Mary, the "Nunc Dimittis" of Simeon, and the "Gloria in Excelsis" of the angels. The very air was tremulous with song when Christ was born. These devout souls were waiting for the Sun of Righteousness, who was rising with healing in his wings.

Beautiful is the title which Zacharias gives to the Christ—the Day-spring. The Apostle Peter called him the Day-star, and the Apostle John writes of him as the Bright and Morning-star. The word Day-spring is literally the rising, as of the sun, the dawn of a new and heavenly day. The Magi said: "We have seen his star in the East." Most appropriate is the word Day-spring in this connection. In Palestine there is no twilight, no gloaming. The sun suddenly drops below the horizon in the evening, and the darkness almost immediately falls, and in the morning the sun rises with equal suddenness, and the earth is flooded with its supernal splendor. The birth of Christ was the coming of the Day-spring, the rising of the Sun of Righteousness upon a world long in darkness and sorrow.

The Angelic Choir

Amid the many voices that greeted the advent of the Christ, were the songs of celestial choirs. Once in Scripture, God is represented as singing. The passage in which this representation is given is most instructive and beautiful. The Lord God is represented as rejoicing over his people with joy, as resting in his love, and as expressing that joy and love with singing. This is a marvelous description of God. Think what the Church would give for the words and score of that divine song! Next to that desire is the longing to know the score of the anthem chanted by the celestial choir when Christ was born. My text gives us the substance of the wonderful anthem which the angels sang. Heaven and earth seemed to join hands and to touch hearts on that glorious occasion.

These inhabitants of heaven seemed to be ever near the earth while Christ sojourned among men. They ministered to him while in the wilderness of temptation; they strengthened him in the agony of Gethsemane; they sat at the head and the foot of the place when he lay in the sepulchre; and it was most fitting that they should announce his advent with songs of celestial joy.

The eyes of the shepherds might well have been dazzled by the outstreaming glory of the Lord which wrapped them about as a mantle of light. The sublime solo soon gave place to the triumphant chorus. It seemed as if the heavens were filled with attendant angels who only awaited the signal to burst forth in heavenly music. In the olden time, when the sacrifice was laid on the altar, the blast of silver trumpets sounded out clear and strong; so when he came, who was true Sacrifice, and when the angel soloist had ended his song, a multitude of the heavenly host chanted again the blessed message of the first herald-angel. This anthem in its heavenward aspects was "glory," and in its earthward significance it was "peace."

It has sometimes been said that this was the first, as it was the last, time that angelic voices were heard by mortal ears. But, strictly speaking, this is the second time that voices from heaven fell upon human ears. In Isaiah's rapt vision, heaven was opened and the glory of the Lord was seen. Then the trembling posts of the temple almost broke down as the glory of Jehovah filled the courts. The same glory now floods the plains of Bethlehem. Then an angelic hymn announced the coming of the kingdom; now another angelic hymn proclaims that the heavenly King has come. As has been well said by Edersheim, "Then it had been the Tris-Haggion of prophetic anticipation; now that of evangelic fulfilment."

Heaven's Gala Days

Nothing could be more fitting than that the angels who stood around the throne of the heavenly King should follow him to the earth when he came on his message of mercy. The angels have had two gala days in their unique and glorious experience; the first was when the foundations of creation were laid with shouts of joy, the sons of God singing together; the second was when the foundations of the new heaven and the new earth were laid, the angels chanting the event with loftier songs than had ever before been heard, even in heaven's glorious temple. The very air seemed sacred since it bore so sweet a message from heaven; the earth itself seems consecrated since the coming of its Lord and Creator. We may well believe that angels from a sinless heaven never performed a more welcome service than when they made the plains of Bethlehem echo with their songs of joy when the Christ was born.

DR. ROBERT STUART MAC ARTHUR

Angels are presented to us as bending reverently forward and gazing intently, as if listening earnestly to the mysteries of God concerning the coming of Christ. Possessed by a holy curiosity, they are trying to discover the secrets of human redemption. It was therefore fitting that these lofty intelligences, at the supreme moment of God's sublimest disclosure of eternal love, should break forth into matchless music over the cradle of the infant Redeemer. Poetry and music have often exhausted themselves in preparing and chanting cradle songs. Mothers have found their highest joy in crooning these songs over mere earthly cradles and human babes. It was fitting, therefore, that the Divine-human Babe should have an angel choir to chant his cradle song, and it was further fitting that that song should be an anthem radiant with glory to God and beautiful with peace toward men.

The Angelic Doxology

This sublime anthem recognizes God as the author of human salvation. The gift of the Messiah redounds to the praise of God. All his works manifest his glory, but the gift of his Son for the redemption of man calls for praise to God in the highest places, and in the loftiest strains. The advent of Christ was a new manifestation of God's eternal love to sinful men. It is no wonder, therefore, that this song, "Gloria in Excelsis," should have been so honored in the service of the Church for so many generations. A single expression employed in this song, and coming to us along the ages, through the Latin Vulgate Version, has given us the title by which the angelic song is known. Probably the chant, as we now have it, originated in the Greek Church about the year 300. It is one of the noblest compositions the Church has ever produced. It fittingly prolongs the echoes of the celestial choir which announced the birth of the Messiah King.

The birth of Christ inaugurated a new era in human history; it was really the birth of a new race. The incarnation is the basal fact in Christianity. The Evangelist John distinctly affirms that the Word was God, and also that the Word became flesh. The incarnation of Christ was the entrance of Deity into humanity, in a fuller and diviner sense than ever before. The real meaning of the incarnation is the actual entrance of God into humanity by a supernatural birth. To deny the supernatural birth is to deny the real significance of the incarnation itself.

The Increasing Shechinah

God made himself known in creation, in providence and in revelation; but the incarnation was the sublimest manifestation of God the world had ever before known. God's revelation of himself is evermore progressive; he reveals himself as men are able to understand, and even to endure, the revelation. The glory of the Lord that shone about the shepherds was the miraculous effulgence which the rabbins called the Shechinah. This miraculous light was a lambent flame in the bush which burned but was not consumed; it went before Israel in a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night; it flooded the temple of Solomon with an unendurable brightness; it was the glory which the shepherds saw at Bethlehem; it was the radiant cloud which enfolded the ascending Lord, and it will be the canopy over the great white throne on which he will sit to judge the world. Well might this effulgent brightness appear in glad homage to the incarnation. There has thus been in the glory of the Shechinah ever an increasing light, for Christ is the true pillar of cloud to guide his Church through the world to her triumph and glory in heaven.

There has ever been a progressive revelation of Christ in his person. He was the Shiloh in Genesis; the I Am in Exodus; and the Star and Sceptre in Numbers. In Deuteronomy he is our Rock; in Joshua, he is the Captain of the Lord's Host; and in Job, he is the Redeemer. In Isaiah, he is the Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father and the Prince of Peace. In Jeremiah, he is the Lord Our Righteousness; in Daniel, he is the Messiah; in Zechariah, he is the Branch; and in Haggai, he is the Desire of All Nations. In Malachi, he is the Messenger of the Covenant and the Sun of Righteousness.

Progressive Manifestations

There is a progression also in his incarnations. It was he who appeared to Moses in the burning bush; it was he who appeared to Joshua as the captain of the Lord's Host; it was he who appeared to Gideon as he was threshing corn, and who saluted him with the words, "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." There were thus many temporary incarnations before the one great incarnation in the manger-cradle at Bethlehem.

The incarnation of Deity was dimly hinted in many legends in heathen mythology. Parts of these mythologies were unconscious prophecies of great Christian truths. Heathenism was feeling after God, if haply it might find him. Philosophy was seeking after Deity, but, in its loftiest reach it simply built an altar to "the unknown God." The human mind must have God in human form. God as the uncreated and the invisible, and not also as the incarnate, must remain incomprehensible, except to a few devout worshippers. But Deity incarnate, enfleshed, embodied in human form, dwelling among men, rejoicing in their joy, weeping with their sorrow, cradled with their babies—Deity thus united to humanity, men can understand, admire, trust and adore. The incarnation of Deity is thus an absolute necessity of our poor human nature. To worship God as Father, and Christ as Brother, we must see the Divine in human form. The greatest of all marvels is that Christ should come from the bosom of the Father to the cradle in Bethlehem.

The incarnation is the sublimest revelation of eternal love. In his marvelous description of the mind of Christ, in the second chapter of Philippians, the Apostle Paul represents Christ as not grasping and holding his conscious equality with God, but as emptying himself, and taking the form of a servant. This was the first great step in the downward plunge. After the incarnation, Gethsemane with its cup, and Calvary with its cross, were inevitable. God's eternal, limitless, and unspeakable love gave the world its crowning manifestation when his only begotten and well-beloved Son became the child of Mary, and thus tented in human flesh. The human soul constantly cries out with Philip, "Show us the Father." We must see God in human form, in order that the longing of our hearts and the logical demands of our minds may be satisfied. Sitting at the feet of Jesus, his words to Philip fall upon our ears and hearts as God's sweetest benediction, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father."

A Significant Relation

It ought to be remembered that this angelic doxology, "Glory to God in the highest," is not a prayer, but an ascription of praise. The angels did not pray "Glory be to God;" but the angels joyfully exclaimed "Glory is to God." This was no time to be praying to God to manifest his glory, when the earth was radiant with the sublimest manifestation of that glory which it had ever known. It was a time when even blind men might see and deaf men might hear. There is a blessed connection between the three stanzas of this divine anthem; there is a close relation between peace on earth, good-will to men, on the one side, and the highest glory to God on the other side. The angels are declaring that the rebellious race of man is to be subdued; that this belligerent world is not forever to flaunt its defiant flag against heaven's King. We have here a sweet implication, if not a direct assurance, that lost men shall be redeemed, manifold sin be controlled, and that Satan shall be destroyed by the personal Christ. Thus the anthem may well fill heaven's lofty dome with its doxology, "Glory to God in the highest."

If we follow the Revised Version, the dominant thought of the angelic host is that peace will come to men of good-will. This may mean to men of good-will toward one another, or toward God, or with whom God is well pleased. It is difficult to decide which is the true reading. Our common reading, moreover, is greatly to be preferred. It gives the more simple and natural meaning of the word translated, "good-will," and it is very much more in harmony with the doxology found in the first part of the verse. This is

A Sweet and Heavenly Benediction

The presence of God embodied in human flesh was designed to produce peace between men and their fellow-men; between the opposing elements in men's own hearts, and between men and God. Christ is the Prince of Peace. God was now in Christ reconciling the world to himself. When men are at peace with God, they will be at peace with one another. It is a striking fact that when Jesus was born the world experienced a profound peace. The sound of war was not heard throughout the boundaries of Rome's mighty empire. Beautifully has Milton, in his Ode to the Nativity, said:

Nor war, or battle's sound
Was heard the world around
The idle spear and shield were high up hung!
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood!
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng,
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovereign Lord was by.

By order of the Emperor Augustus, the gates of the temple of Janus were closed, for only the third time in seven centuries. A bright prospect was opening for the human race. Long delayed is the fulfilment of the prophecy that swords shall become ploughshares and spears pruning-hooks. But the day will surely come when this blessed result shall be secured.

Two nations are now engaged in awful war, and the effusion of blood makes the heart sick and the spirit faint. But war's horrors are hastening the days of universal peace. The day will assuredly come when all international difficulties will be settled by international arbitration. The last few months have witnessed the signing of a greater number of treaties of arbitration than were ever before made in as many years. America has the honor of leading the nations in this blessed mission of peace and good-will toward all men. Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt have done more to secure this result than was done by all preceding Presidents of the United States. Secretary Hay, the foremost diplomatist in the world, beautifully blends American patriotism with the teaching of the Golden Rule, in negotiating treaties and in preserving peace with many nations. He has lifted diplomacy to a higher level than it ever before reached in the history of the race; he has more nearly realized the meaning of this celestial anthem in human affairs, than was ever before known since the birth of the Prince of Peace.

We need still higher standards of diplomacy, patriotism, heroism and religion. We are pressing toward the realization of these higher standards. Already the Eastern sky is radiant with the crimson and gold of at least one element of millennial blessing—the preservation of peace, the abolition of war, and the universality of arbitration.

By the manner in which he entered into the world, Christ dignified the estate of childhood. He hallowed the cradles of the world. He made babyhood beautiful and divine. As he hallowed the grave by making it his temporary resting-place, so he has made the cradle radiant by having lain therein.

Glorified Poverty

He has also glorified motherhood throughout the world. He has put a crown of honor on every mother's brow. He has also glorified poverty. He was the only child ever born into this world who had his choice as to how he should come. He might have come, as did the first Adam, a full grown man; he chose to come a helpless babe. He might have come in all the pomp and pageantry of earthly kings, he chose to come in lowly poverty.

His cradle teaches us also, wherein consists true greatness. When he lay in that cradle, mighty Caesar was on his throne. Where now are Caesar and his throne? At Caesar's name nations trembled; but that name and power and throne have perished. The empire of Jesus endures—it is the empire of undying love, and it will never perish. His name shall endure longer than the sun. All kings shall fall down and serve him. The empire of love triumphs over the empire of power.

O, men and women, submit now to the sceptre of his love; kneel at his cradle and give him the gold, the frankincense, and the myrrh of sincere devotion. Then rise to have peace in your heart, in your home, and in the social circles in which you move. At this glad Christmas-tide, let us settle all private and personal grudges and hates; let us forgive and forget; let us restore all sad estrangements; let us pray for peace in our own hearts and throughout the world. O, blessed Child of the Manger, and Ancient of Days! O, Son of Mary and Son of God, be born in our hearts to-day! Then shall we with a new experience and an unspeakable joy join our voices with those of the celestial choir in chanting the glorious anthem: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men."

OUR LITTLE ORPHANS IN CHINA

AFTER the recent succession of famines in China, not only in Shansi and Shensi provinces, but in the country to the south and westward of Canton, it was found that the widespread mortality among adults, in the agricultural districts especially, had left a great many little orphan children totally destitute. To care for these little ones, and, if possible, to bring a limited number of them under missionary influence and training, as was done with the famine orphans of India, was repeatedly urged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by friends both at home and abroad. After due consideration, it was decided to communicate with the missionaries, and some of the letters received show that the project is one which, in many parts of China, would be very warmly welcomed.

The first of these native Chinese orphans to be adopted under this plan were destitute children of Shensi province. This is the province where the memorable relief work was conducted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several years ago, when the great famine was decimating the population there and in the adjoining province of Shansi. Pastor W. Haggvist, a Lutheran missionary at Hsian, Shensi, in the following letter, sends the intelligence of their adoption. He writes:

"I send herewith a list of the native orphan children we have taken up to be cared for, trained and educated for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's generous patrons. On this list there are thirty-six. Last winter we had a large number of children on our lists, which we hoped to be able to adopt, but your final answer regarding the support did not reach us before April. Last spring the poor children nearly all went out into the country, where they can find a little to do in the summer, getting food enough to keep alive. Now, as the cold winter weather sets in, the poor little children are coming into the cities in great numbers. Those whose names I am sending you we have had from July 1st. A few more from two of our stations have not reached me yet. We are making the necessary arrangements to receive them. I hope to send you an addition to this list in a short time, and also a few details regarding the children themselves. We trust you will remember both us and the children in your prayers. W. HAGGVIST."

The list of children is given below:

Yen teh ua, Ma Ih Sa, Ni long, Ts'ao Shao ri, Li lan mei, Liu an, Ts'in king, Ts'in puh, Ts'in cheo, An ting, Li kiu, Li chen lien, Ni ai lien, Chin tsong Siang, Kao in ua, Li Chong huan, Ts'in liu hsi, Yang ai ho, Yang meng neng, Liu ken chong, Chen nen king, Huang kin kii, Ren tsai neng, Chang tong cheng, Li chen hsing, Chu uan chong, Song t'ien pao, P'ang li chi, Hu Rui chi, Liu ki tsai, Liu ki pao, Ko kii ua, Yu an ua, Chang ien ming, Lu tien neng, Lu ai lien.

Other lists, from various missionaries in China, will be published as received. The work will be inter-denominational. All the children will receive Christian training, and will be taught useful industries, so that they may be equipped for the battle of life. Where special talent is developed, an effort will be made to have the young protegee trained with a view to ultimately becoming an evangelist, preacher or teacher to his own people. In the present condition of China, when the ancient empire is on the eve of great changes, which may transform its character and give it a new and important place among the nations, it is of the utmost importance that the doctrines of Christianity should be disseminated with zeal and vigor. That there is no better way of evangelizing a nation than by dealing with the children, has already been demonstrated by missionary experience in many lands, and especially in India. Under Divine blessing, let us hope that the work among the Chinese children may lead to substantial spiritual results.

Better than Last Year

The Crown Dictionary is especially acceptable to elderly eyes, for clearness of type, for size, and for convenience of handling. As regards the Calendar, though that of last year was handsome, I like this year's much better.

"TRUTH"

THE GREAT NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY, NOW IN PROCESS OF ERECTION

"SILENCE"

It has been said that "Of the making of books there is no end," and in view of the many buildings devoted to books which are springing up all over the land, we might say with equal truth that of the founding of libraries there seems to be no end—at least the end is not yet in sight.

It may be interesting to the general reader to take a close range, though necessarily limited view of some of the oldest and best known institutions devoted to the housing, care, and distribution of books. In speaking of the great public libraries of New York—with their vast accumulations of all the best books on science, exploration, biography, the classics, art, travel, poetry, sociology, philosophy, and fiction—one naturally turns to the Astor, as one of the oldest established and best known. It is situated on Lafayette Place, a street at the present time entirely given over to business, but at the period of its erection many of New York's richest and most aristocratic families dwelt in the immediate vicinity, within a stone's-throw of what is now considered an antiquated building, where room can hardly be found for its hundreds and thousands of volumes. It was in 1854, just fifty years ago, that the Astor Library was built. Its founder was John Jacob Astor, of Waldorf, near Heidelberg, Germany; a man who previous to his coming to this country and becoming one of the richest men of his time in the United States, had headed many benefactions abroad. Washington Irving was the first president of the board of trustees of the new library, the original cost of which was $400,000, which, before the present day of colossal fortunes and immense benefactions, was considered a most munificent gift. In 1859 an extension was built, which, with the ground, cost $550,000, being the gift of Wm. B. Astor. In 1881 a third hall was added by J. J. Astor, grandson of the founder. This addition also included a new central entrance, broad vestibule and a trustee's room. In the vestibule are twenty classic busts, the gift of Mrs. Delano, a sister of Mr. Astor. There are a great number of rare books in this old building, many of them of almost priceless value. Among them is one of the few copies of Wyckliffe's translation of the New Testament, closely resembling black letter, enriched with illuminated capitals, and dated 1390. There is an Ethiopic MS. on vellum, which was the service book of an Abyssinian convent in Jerusalem. There are also two richly-illuminated Persian MSS. on vellum, once belonging to the library of a Mogul, emperor of Delhi. Also there is to be seen the splendid Salisbury Missal, written with wonderful skill, and profusely emblazoned with burnished gold. One special treasure is the second Bible printed on vellum, dated 1462, which cost $9,000.

One MS., in golden letters on purple vellum, is over 1,200 years old. The visitor may also view a rare collection of paintings, costing more than $75,000, the gift of William W. Astor.

On the shelves of the New York Public Library, which is a consolidation of the Astor, Lenox and Tilden foundations, there are 629,506 volumes and 240,337 pamphlets. During the year ending June, 1904, 128,872 readers consulted 524,097 volumes. There are twenty-two branches, containing 384,399 volumes, circulated among 3,291,374 readers. The Tilden Trust, incorporated in 1887, was created by the will of the late Samuel J. Tilden, which gave his entire residuary estate to trustees, to establish and maintain a free library and reading room.

The Lenox Library was founded by James Lenox, who gave land on Fifth Avenue, between Seventieth and Seventy-first Streets, large funds, a valuable collection of Bibles, manuscripts and Americana. Miss Henrietta Lenox subsequently gave large endowments, as did Mrs. R. L. Stuart and others. The Americana which Mr.

Lenox left to his trustees have been greatly enriched by subsequent purchases for students of history. It was an enormous task getting the three collections together. The consolidation was formed in May, 1895, and at the present writing, a magnificent building is being erected on Fifth Avenue, at Forty-second Street, which will be large enough to hold the different collections now housed in the old Astor Library in Lafayette Place, and at the old Lenox building in Fifth Ave. When completed, the New York Public Library building will hold one of the greatest collections in the world, and will be commensurate at least with the wealth, population and intellectual standing of one of the greatest cities in the world. It will stand in Bryant Park, occupying the site of the old reservoir, and fronting on Fifth Avenue. On the first floor will be the main exhibition room. On the second will be the rooms of the directors and trustees, and lecture and reading-rooms. The top floor will contain the Stuart collection. It is estimated that the building which is now in process of construction will cost nearly $3,000,000.

This consolidation of the various collections and funds of the three foundations makes a beginning of what ought to become one of the greatest libraries of the world. The British Museum, Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, and the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg, are at present the largest libraries in the world. The Congressional Library at Washington, D. C., has about 1,000,000 volumes. It was founded in 1800, with a fund of $5,000.

The Mercantile Library Association of New York, has a very interesting history. On November 3, 1820, the following notice was posted upon the bulletin board of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

NOTICE TO MERCHANTS' CLERKS AND APPRENTICES

Those young gentlemen who are disposed to form a Mercantile Library and evening reading room, are desired to attend a meeting for that purpose at the Tontine Coffee House, on Thursday evening next, at 7 o'clock, when a plan of a library and association will be presented for their consideration. The young men of South Street, Front, Water, Pearl, Maiden Lane, and Broadway, are particularly desired to attend.

(Signed), Wm. Wood.

The meeting was held, and the Association was started. A constitution was adopted, which placed the control of the library in the hands of the merchants' clerks; they alone were permitted to vote and hold office, although all persons of good character could become members. The beginning was a very small one, the library being opened on the 12th of Feb. 1821, at 49 Fulton Street. There were but 150 members, who met in a small room, where the books, about 700 in number, were kept. Most of these had been donated. In one year these had increased to 1,000. In 1828, so great was the interest in the Association, and so rapidly had the number of books increased, that a separate organization was formed for the purpose of building a suitable structure for the use of the library. This was called the Clinton Hall Association, and in one year $33,500 was raised. The new building was erected on the corner of Nassau and Beekman Streets (now the site of Temple Court), and was dedicated under the name of Clinton Hall. Twenty years afterward, the site being considered too far downtown, and the library having outgrown its accommodations, the Astor Place Opera House was purchased. At the time of removal in 1854, the library possessed 43,000 volumes. For thirty-six years this building was used, every available spot being filled with books; but in 1890 it was vacated, and the handsome building now occupied by the Association, was put up on the old site in the square bounded by Broadway, Fourth Avenue, Astor Place, and Eighth Street. It is seven stories high, and, occupying a square, it is lighted on all sides, and in addition has a skylight two-thirds as large as the roof space. The circulating department is on the seventh floor, also the catalogue department, work-room, directors' room, and librarian's office.

The storage room for books is considered one of the finest, if not the best room for the purpose, in the country. The height from the floor to skylight is twenty-five feet. The full storage capacity is 475,000 volumes. At present it has a book-stack two tiers high, each tier being seven feet in height, and so arranged that a third tier can be added when required. The stairway and flooring of each stack are made of iron. The cards of the catalogue are contained in two cases of polished oak, each case having thirty-three drawers. The plan is in three divisions. The first contains the author and title—cards arranged alphabetically; the second division consists of the subject—entries arranged alphabetically by subjects and classes; the third is entirely fiction, arranged under the name of the author and the title of the book, in one alphabet. There are also tables arranged for the consulting of printed catalogues, and order blanks are within easy reach. On the sixth floor is the reading-room and the department for reference and study. Everything is arranged for the comfort and convenience of the reader and student. The floor is covered with cork carpet, rendering footsteps noiseless; the armchairs are made of oak and upholstered in leather. A compartment in the centre of the room holds 600 newspapers and magazines. Each compartment has the name, in gold letters, of the periodical it contains.

The late Dr. Deems, of the "Church of the Strangers," in New York, had a very warm place in his heart for the Mercantile Library. Directly after the close of the Civil War, the good doctor came to New York from Baltimore. In telling the story, he said: "My servants were free, my house was burned, my land was taxed, my library had been captured. In the language of an old Georgia friend: 'The Lord had taken away pretty nearly all my circumstances,' and I had removed to New York. I was commencing life afresh. A publishing house solicited me to write a book on 'Jesus the Christ.' I had no library, and I told them so. 'But, there is the Mercantile Library,' they said. 'Yes,' I replied; but I have not the money to pay the fees, and besides, I might want a hundred books at once.' 'Let us go and see the librarian,' said the representative of the publishing house." The upshot of the matter was that an alcove was fitted up for Dr. Deems; every book he wanted was promptly at his disposal, and everything was done to facilitate his work, as the librarian desired to increase the Christological department, which at that time was not large. For three years, the Rev. Doctor spent his mornings in this library; at the end of that time, The Light of Nations was produced, of which 400,000 copies were sold.

Columbia University, in the upper part of the city, has a fine library building, the gift of former President Low, which cost over one million dollars. There are about 300,000 bound volumes and many pamphlets in this library.

In the public libraries may be found students of both sexes, who find here the text-books and books of reference, which would otherwise, in many cases, be beyond their reach. In the women's cozy corners are grouped many feminine types, from the sedate middle-aged, quietly-dressed woman, looking up data for a more or less scientific or sociological article on which she may be engaged, to the hustling, quick-motioned and quick-brained newspaper writer, who is digging up the past achievements of for book mutilators and print thieves. The attendants and those who stand at the distributing counters, converse in low tones, stepping quietly from one place to another as occasion demands; and though the great noisy city is all about—the rumble of traffic, the clang of bells, and all the nondescript tumult inseparable from the restless life of the metropolis, never penetrates the thick walls of the library buildings. Here one can study or read at leisure, sure of no interruption. Many widely-known authors here spend days and weeks getting ideas for their stories. Some of the librarians have served at their posts during a whole generation, and they are personally known to and appreciated by the home book-lovers.

A most interesting institution is that of the free library and reading-room connected with the Cooper Institute, which was founded in New York City by Peter Cooper in 1857. It provides a free reading-room and library for the working classes. All current newspapers and magazines are on file in the reading-room, and many of the unemployed in search of a situation, haunt the room daily to look over the "Wanted" advertisements. The room at times harbors many strange characters, and they present interesting studies of human nature. These readers of papers and magazines sometimes take great pains to write at length their approval or the reverse of the articles they read, filling all the surrounding margins with their opinions, which are often curious, and as interesting as the original article.

HENRIK IBSEN AND HIS WORK

CABLE dispatches a few days ago brought the intelligence that Henrik Ibsen, the Scandinavian Shakespeare, and one of the noblest European literary personalities of the last half century, had been stricken with paralysis. Later news stated that he was recovering.

The great novelist and dramatist was born at Skien, Norway, on March 20, 1828, his parents being Knud Ibsen, a merchant of that place, and Maria Cornelia Altenburg, his wife. He was of mixed Danish, Scotch and German ancestry. As a child he was moody and thoughtful, reading much and poring over old books while other children were at play. He was full of strange notions, and dabbled in amateur magic and stage scenes cut out of pasteboard, with figures in dramatic attitudes. At school, he learned the common branches, with a little Latin and a smattering of theology. He was, however, a devoted student of the Bible. On leaving Skien, he was apprenticed to a pharmacist in Grimstad, where he lived six years.

It was while he lived at Grimstad that Ibsen first began to give evidence of that remarkable genius which, in later life, brought him into world-wide prominence. Here he became an observant student of human nature, and began to lay plans for his future career. Here also, his first literary efforts saw the light. He wrote poems and sonnets, and some patriotic verses that appealed to the Norwegian and Swedish heart, and laid the foundations of his first serious work, Catalina, which he based on the story found in Sallust and Cicero. It was printed in Christiania at the expense of a friend of Ibsen. The little volume contained twenty-six poems, the first written when Ibsen was nineteen years old.

In 1850 he went to Christiania to study medicine, but it had already become clear to himself that literature was to be his life-work. He spent much of his leisure time and all of his holidays in writing, and it was in those student days that his powers of dramatization first began to be apparent. He studied the old traditions and legends of his country, utilizing here and there such material as was suited to his themes. His dramatic poem, The Warrior's Tomb (the story of a Norse Viking who was converted to Christianity), won him recognition in the literary circles of the capital. He gave up his medical studies altogether, and with two other young writers began the publication of a weekly paper called The Man, which, being too revolutionary for the political tendencies of the time, was short-lived. While it flourished, however, he was a copious contributor of poems, prose sketches and little dramas, few, if any, of which appear in any collection of his later works.

From 1856 to 1894, Ibsen's versatile genius produced in rapid succession a series of lyric and dramatic works which won him fame and comparative affluence. Recognition came slowly, however, and the Norwegian poet was appreciated by the world of letters only after years of struggle. In 1864 he left Norway, and lived thereafter abroad for a long time, chiefly in Rome, Dresden, and Munich. In 1864, the Norwegian Parliament granted him a pension. His principal works are: The Banquet at Solhaug (1856), Lady Inger at Ostrat (1857), The Warriors in Helgeland (1858), The Rival Kings (1864), Brand (1866), Peer Gynt (1867), Emperor and Galilean (1873), The Pillars of Society (1875), A Doll's House (1878), Ghosts, and An Enemy of the People (1882), The Wild Duck (1884), Rosmersholm (1886), The Lady from the Sea (1888), The Master Builder (1892). His later works aroused a storm of controversy, but as people began to know his writings better, they recognized a true genius, and accepted him as one who, though a strong and uncompromising realist, is always guided by a high moral purpose. Brand and Peer Gynt are esteemed the ablest of his works.

Like many other great writers, Ibsen has been charged with finding much of his inspiration in the works of earlier authors. He adapted, transformed and glorified whatever he borrowed, and made it serve the highest and best purposes. His philosophy is always pure and helpful, and the strong moral of his work is clear in every page. His theme is always a high one, and if he ever strikes the lower chords of human nature, it is to make the contrast with the higher all the stronger. Pride, vacillation, unregulated passion, ambition, immorality (personal or inherited), vanity, jealousy, covetousness, intellectual and moral slothfulness, and other human weaknesses are pilloried in Ibsen's writings and their results unsparingly exposed, while all the better qualities of our natures, strengthened and developed by high spiritual purpose, are held up for imitation.

New Missionaries for India

SIX missionaries, representing the Christian and Missionary Alliance, sailed from New York for India, on Dec. 6. They will proceed to Bombay, where they will be assigned to duty at the various stations in the interior. A considerable part of the first two years will be devoted to learning the language, after which the new workers will be able to take up their full share of teaching, visiting, and evangelistic labor.

The six ladies who, after several years of special training, have now entered the foreign mission field and consecrated their lives to the spread of the Gospel among the natives of India, are: Misses Lucy Holmes, Daisy Milham, Martha Barr, Elsie Leonard, Alice Maud White, and Agnes Fraser. Miss Alice Yoder, the well-known missionary of Khamgaon, Berar (the story of whose spiritual and industrial work on a missionary farm in India was lately published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), goes with the party as chaperon. Miss Milham will probably go to Khamgaon, where she will have charge of the weaving industry, and Miss Barr will also be assigned to the same station. Miss Fraser does not appear in the photograph, as she was not in New York when it was taken.

Morning and Evening

THE husk of the darkness slips away;
Out of the dusk blooms the flower of day.

And the sweetest thing in the world to me
Is the chatter of children full of glee,
The patter of feet on the nursery floor,
The rap of elves at my chamber door;
All the little ones wide awake,
I face the world for the children's sake.

In the gathering dusk the day-flower shuts;
Wearily plodding in year-long ruts
I seek my home; as I turn the key,
The chatter of children welcomes me.

Never was music half so sweet
As the merry rush of the little feet;
I hear the sound of a blithe uproar
As I turn the key in my dear home door;
With hurry and flurry the little band
Fall on me, storm me, seize my hand,
And then the soft warm cloak of the dusk
Wraps the day in a circling husk.
The stars come out, the day is done,
Sleep gathers my babies, every one,
And what do I care for the world's hard fight,
I am safe with my own till the morning light.

How Uncle Sam will Greet 1905

BY WALDON FAWCETT

THE United States Government sends out to all the nations of the globe, from the U. S. Naval Observatory at Washington, a very novel New Year's greeting, in the form of an electrical time-signal, which announces the advent of the dawning year. This impulse of the magic current, starting from Uncle Sam's unique time-factory, will not only set right or correct more than 70,000 clocks in all parts of the United States, which are connected with it by means of the network of telegraph lines covering our land, but, continuing on its lightning journey around the world, will proclaim the arrival of the American New Year to all the peoples of the earth. The Republic's ingenious greeting to humanity will speed over 1,180,000 miles of telegraph wires and cables, and, incredible as it may seem, a period of only ten seconds is required for the tidings to encircle the globe.

The method of determining accurately, even to the hundredth of a second, the correct time for making this significant announcement, is in itself most interesting. By means of a telescope known as a "transit instrument," an observer watches the movement of the stars, and by their aid corrects a big clock which stands close at hand.

Opposite this large timepiece are two smaller clocks, which, automatically, send out the time-signal. They cost $700 each, and two are provided, so that there will be no hitch in the proceedings should one break down or meet with accident.

At 11.30 o'clock on the last night of the year, the "transmitting clock" is corrected to the thousandth of a second, from the large clock which, as has just been explained, has, in turn, been corrected from the stars. At about three minutes before midnight, the clock which is to give the signal is switched into the telegraph circuit, and all business ceases on the 350,000 miles of telegraph wire, which stretch up and down, around and across the Republic.

In order to warn the telegraph operators all over the country that the long-awaited signal is coming, it is preceded by warnings sent out from the Observatory. As the hour approaches, the seconds are "clicked off" by the telegraph instruments all over the country. There is, however, an omission of the signal for the twenty-ninth second in order to indicate to the watchers the approach of the half-minute, and then, after the fifty-fifth second has been heralded, five seconds are skipped to warn all listeners that the supreme signal is about to be sounded. Finally, in the last one-hundredth of the fifty-ninth minute of the last hour of the year, the electric circuit is closed, and all over the country bells ring, whistles blow and cannon roar. This signal, to be sure, is not given absolutely simultaneously in all the cities under the Stars and Stripes, but it is approximately so, as may be appreciated when it is explained that only one-fifth of a second is required to flash the signal from Washington to San Francisco.

Since there are in the United States several different legal times in different sections of the country, and as the New Year signal is sent out from the national capital at midnight, Eastern time, it goes without saying that it is somewhat premature in those States and Territories which do not border on the Atlantic seaboard. In order that all Uncle Sam's citizens may be shown the same courtesy, the New Year signal is repeated at what, according to the big clocks at Washington, are 1 o'clock, 2 o'clock and 3 o'clock A.M., respectively, for the benefit of the Central, Mountain and Pacific "Time Belts" of the country, thus giving to each division of our broad land its announcement at exactly midnight.

However, the signal which is flashed around the world is that which goes out from Washington at midnight, and in many a foreign clime time-balls drop and flags are dipped, not because it there ushers in the first day of the new year—for it is already broad daylight on the other side of the globe—but simply as a compliment to the New World nation, which devised this pretty plan for saluting sister Powers at the beginning of a new year.

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

WITH the destruction of the Russian fleet by the Japanese, the war in the Far East has entered upon a new stage. After a week's bombardment by the heavy calibre Japanese artillery mounted on 203-Metre Hill, the warships Pallada, Pobieda, Peresvet and Retvizan were sunk in the harbor, only their funnels and upper works now being visible. The Sevastopol, which sought to escape the bombardment by going out to sea, fell a victim to Admiral Togo's torpedo-boats, and was destroyed together with a Russian transport. No statement has been made concerning the loss of life in these attacks, but it was probably slight, as the heavy guns on the Russian warships had all been dismantled and taken to strengthen the land fortifications, and the crews had doubtless accompanied them.

Eight thousand fresh Japanese troops, with siege guns and quick-firers, have been landed to reinforce Gen. Nogo's army, which is now attacking three of the strongest fortifications at Port Arthur, still held by the Russians. What the condition of Gen. Stoessel's garrison now is can only be conjectured. These plucky defenders succeeded, after the destruction of the fleet, in sending a sailboat to Chefoo, with messengers to communicate with St. Petersburg. Blockade-runners are supplying the fortress with food and ammunition.

Admiral Togo is now preparing for the reception of the Russian Baltic fleet. He will leave a small naval force to guard the entrance to Port Arthur, and with the rest of his warships, strengthened by the addition of others that have lately been repaired at the Sasebo Navy Yard, he will hold himself in readiness to meet the Russian vessels, which are proceeding slowly. Admiral Voelkersahm's squadron by way of the Red Sea, and that of Admiral Rosjstvensky by way of the Cape of Good Hope. It is believed that the two divisions of the Czar's policy of Prince Mirsky, the new Minister of the Interior, and they predict a revolution unless he be removed.

Inactivity marks the military situation on the Sha River. With the exception of occasional unimportant skirmishes, no fighting has occurred between the forces of Gen. Kouropatkin and the Japanese for several weeks. Both sides are strongly entrenched. There is considerable snow and ice, and the weather is bitterly cold.

fleet may have a rendezvous at Tamatave, in Madagascar, where they will join forces. There is a rumor that the Czar will send a third squadron of seven battle-ships, five cruisers and forty torpedo boats from the Baltic, and this, if true, may operate to delay the fleet many weeks. It is scarcely likely that the Japanese will go far from their home waters to seek out the Russian ships. But if the Black Sea fleet should suddenly force the Dardanelles and attempt to join Admiral Voelkersahm's warships, Admiral Togo would probably be despatched to intercept the squadron in detail.

There has, meanwhile, arisen in Russia, a great outcry against the war, resulting in riots at St. Petersburg and several other cities, where the police and troops were engaged in suppressing student demonstrations. These troubles seem to be increasing. Some of the regiments ordered to the Far East have become mutinous, and are causing serious disturbances. All of these troubles, the Grand Dukes and the war party declare, are attributable to the liberal

THE TURKISH HOUSEWIFE

Housewives of Broussa

BY HARRIET G. POWERS

HOW interesting it would be to know how the Cassandras and Antigones and other dames of Hannibal's quaint old city of Broussa, kept house! What did they have for breakfast? And how were their kitchens furnished? But though this knowledge is beyond our ken, we may learn approximately, through observing how the Marigos (Marys) and Eftigs (Fannies) of the present day in Broussa manage their homes.

The kitchen there, as elsewhere, is the foundation of family life. The dining-room may be desirable, but the kitchen is indispensable. Vesta's "sacred fire" still holds together the family and the State.

In Bithynia (of which Broussa is the ancient capital, 150 miles southeast of Constantinople), one must have the kitchen on the lowest floor, so as to be near the fountain in the yard, for Broussa is plentifully supplied with good water. The kitchen must have a stone or cement floor, so that it can be cleansed readily by vigorous application of water and the broom. To protect the feet from cold and damp, the Broussa housewives wear "clogs." A clog may be described as a sandal on two heels (one under the ball of the foot) and a strap passing just above the toes. It may raise one an inch from the floor or more, according to the fancy of the wearer.

One side of the kitchen is nearly taken up with a fireplace, measuring five or six feet across (if the family is small) and about three feet deep. Several feet higher than the floor a stone shelf is built, with pot-holes of stone and plaster, all very crude and rough. A fire is built in each of these pot-holes separately, as needed, to save fuel. Under the shelf are set the ash-pan and kettles. This ojak arrangement is in one sense an improvement on the stove system, as all odors go up the chimney. The saucepans are of copper, tinned within and without, and when fresh look like burnished silver. They are round and of varying sizes. The cover rises half as high as the saucepan itself, crowned by a little saucer, which serves for a handle to lift by. These tenjerehs (saucepans), will last a generation. A round tray is placed on a stool and serves for picking over rice, preparing vegetables or as a dining-table. Sometimes the tenjereh, is set on iron bars laid over the pot-hole, but generally on a trivet. When in haste, the cook can increase the draft by using a sheet-iron funnel, flaring at the bottom, which quickly transforms the black charcoal into a mass of hot, glowing coals.

Every kitchen has a mangal, or brazier, which is either a square, round or oblong iron pan, mounted on iron legs, and containing several inches of ashes on which the charcoal is burned. It holds the fire a long time, and is specially useful for cooking anything that requires a slow, steady heat. There is a handle at either end, astride of one of which sets a pair of sheet-iron tongs.

When the housewife washes her dishes in the stone or cement sink, soap is never used. Bran is much better, both for the plates and for the cook's hands.

Coffee is roasted on a frying pan, and sugar is pounded in a brass mortar. Spits are utilized for roasting kebabs or toothsome morsels of meat. Besides these, the resourceful Turkish housekeeper has several funnels for emptying liquids, wooden spoons and ladles, large, odd-looking knives of native make, copper water-pails, and rush-bottomed chairs and stools. With these her Bithynian kitchen stands complete.

THE ANCIENT CITY OF BROUSSA AS IT APPEARS TO-DAY

The President in the Pulpit

FOR several years past, President Roosevelt has been a member of Grace Reformed Church, at the corner of Fifteenth and O Streets, Washington. It is a chapel of the German Reformed denomination, the tenets of which are practically identical with those of the Dutch Reformed denomination, to which the President belonged before he came to Washington.

The pastor of Grace Church, Rev. John M. Schick, was lately requested by the President to arrange a time when the latter could meet the members of the congregation on some week-day evening. He told Dr. Schick that he greatly enjoyed being a member of the little church, which is one of the simplest and most unpretentious in Washington, and that he desired to have a friendly talk with his fellow-members. On the evening of Thursday, Dec. 15, the opportunity came. The President went to the church at eight o'clock and remained half an hour. After the pastor had spoken, Mr. Roosevelt went to the pulpit and made a brief address to the members. He said:

"Dr. Schick, and my friends and neighbors and fellow-members of this church: As the doctor has said, I first asked for the privilege, and the doctor kindly arranged that it should take place. I wanted to have the chance of saying to you how very greatly I have enjoyed meeting and worshipping with you Sunday after Sunday, and how I have appreciated the companionship with you. When I was still Governor, after I had been elected Vice-President, the doctor wrote that this was the only Reformed Church in Washington, and that he thought he could claim me as a parishioner. It has meant a great deal to me to be able to come here Sunday after Sunday, and to be with you, and especially for the very reason touched upon by the doctor in the few words which we have just listened to—for the sense of brotherhood.

"I think that any man who takes an interest in this great country of ours must realize that the one all-important necessity of our social, industrial and political life is the necessity of the realization of what brotherhood means. We cannot develop our civilization at all unless we develop it upon the basis of each recognizing in his fellow-man his brother, whose interest he must have at heart. No scheme of legislation, no kind of administration of the Government will atone, or can atone for the lack of the fundamental quality of each being in every deed his brother's keeper. I do not mean to talk about every seventh day, but to feel it in the intervening six days, to feel it on the part of the employer with his employees, on the part of the employee with the employer.

"Three-fourths, probably nine-tenths, of the labor troubles, that sometimes assume so ominous a form, would vanish if you could interest the people on each side to approach the matter in the spirit of each striving to care for his fellows as he cares for himself. I do not mean for a moment to neglect his own interests. I want a man to take care of himself; for if he does not, somebody else will have to take care of him. I want him to remember that, in addition to taking care of himself, he has got to try to do his duty by others. If he will approach his fellow-men in the spirit which makes the use of the word brother a genuine term, instead of a term of hypocrisy, the difficulty of dealing with the great questions that arise will be minimized, if not done away with.

"I hope to see the steady growth of the Christian spirit in this country, not merely among our congregations, among the members in their dealings with one another, but among the members of our congregations in their dealings with all mankind, in their dealings with their fellows, with the men and women around about them; and in no way can we so spread the power and influence of our church, in no way can we so effectively bear testimony to it, in no way can we so help in its growth, as by showing that we have been, according to our abilities, doers of the Word as well as hearers, not hearers only."

Interesting and Valuable

The beautiful book, Good Manners for All Occasions, came to me all right. It is indeed very interesting and valuable in any family, rich or poor, and the author, Mrs. Sangster, is a lovely lady. God bless her labors of love, is the prayer of my heart. I like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very much. The Calendar also is very nice.

Worth Double the Price

Your Calendar and Family Worship received. The Calendar is a beauty, and the book, Family Worship, is all right. I prize it very highly, and would not let it go for twice its cost. Your paper is also so good, I can't find words good enough for its praise. I like to keep in touch with the advancement of Christ's cause.

THE FIRST FOOT

A New Year's Story

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE little dressmaker was tired. She had finished and sent home the last stitch of the year's work. Everybody had hurried her, as people do, all wanting their gowns in time for the New Year's reception at the pastor's house, and all making more fuss than usual, because this reception was also to be a wedding occasion. Nan Gilchrist was to be married. From her babyhood, Nan had been the darling of the parish, and now that on her twenty-second birthday, New Year's Day, too, she was to be a bride, and, what was more, the bride of a very rich suitor, whose father had been a boy in Little Windham, the excitement in the parish reached the highest pitch.

Little Windham women did a great deal of their own sewing, and Miss Rivers as a rule, took charge only of the cutting and fitting, and acted as general adviser about the styles and trimmings. But this had been an exceptional season. The crops had been better than in seven years, and Little Windham's purse had been plethoric. People had money to spend. Miss Rivers had engaged several young girls to help her, and her business had been booming. She was tired, but who minds being tired when everything has gone well, when there are no especial worries, and the outlook for the future is radiant?

Miss Rivers had been particularly pleased because Nan Gilchrist had insisted on having her dresses, even to her wedding-gown and the pretty going-away gown, all made in her home town, by her home dressmaker.

"When I am married, Tom may give me what he likes," she said to her mother; "but my trousseau shall be what my father can afford, and I'm not going to be so fine that the rest of you must be pinched for the next twelve months. I should be ashamed if I were selfish, now when I am so happy."

"You never breathed a selfish breath in your whole life, Nan," said her little mother, kissing the girl's fair brow.

The clock struck eight, and Miss Rivers began to think of going to bed. She heard the young people laughing and chatting as they went up the street. They were going to keep watch-night in the old church. Years ago, Miss Rivers had kept watch-night too, but that was when she was a girl, and Jasper Vance had watched the old year out and the new year in, at her side. A foolish quarrel had separated them. Jasper had gone West and never come back, and a report had been brought that he was married and settled. Emily Rivers had long since ceased to grieve, but at anniversary times, since her mother's death, she had been very lonely; yet, though she had been asked more than once, she had never felt like saying yes to any lover's plea. The last one to urge her to change her condition had been Deacon Binns, wealthy, close-fisted, and the father of six children. Nothing in her had responded to his rather tepid middle-aged wooing, and she smiled as she reflected on the cheerfulness with which the Deacon had accepted his dismissal. There were several spinsters of his acquaintance who were willing to become Mrs. Lemuel Binns, and the Deacon was well aware of it and looked about at his leisure.

The door opened and in ran the bride of to-morrow. Nan Gilchrist was tall and slender, with blue eyes and golden hair.

"I want you to know that I am perfectly delighted with everything you have made for me, Miss Emily," she said, "and I want to be sure that you'll come round early in the morning to pin on my veil."

"In the morning, dearie? You are not to be married until three o'clock."

"Ah, but I want to be sure everything will be exactly right, so I'll try on my whole outfit in the morning. How soon can you come, Miss Emily?"

"I'll come as soon as I have wished a happy New Year to whosoever is my first foot over the sill," said Miss Rivers.

"Well, I hope your first foot will bring you good luck, dear friend," answered Nan gaily. "I must fly. I stole away. Tom will be waiting."

Tom was waiting at Miss Rivers' door, and he tucked Nan's little hand within be a happy New Year for somebody besides Nan and himself.

"Miss Rivers will have a New Year's call, or I'm out of my reckoning," he said, as he laid his head on the pillow.

Tom wakened early. A man does not need to be called twice on his wedding day. He stepped to the window and looked out on the beautiful and sparkling winter's morning. Snow, hard packed and crisp, lay on the ground. The sun came up in a golden sky, the East shining and resplendent.

Early as it was, his neighbor in the next room was astir too. He had company in his room, and Tom heard a child's voice and a child's silvery laughter. Before long, the door opened and closed, and the

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO THE BEST WOMAN IN THE WHOLE WIDE WORLD!"

his arm, and they went to the church together just for an hour of prayer and a hymn. But they sat in the last pew, hand in hand, and in the shadow of the organ-loft where nobody saw them. Soon they slipped out and went home, and Tom bade Nan good-night, and turned his steps to the little country inn, where he was stopping. As he crossed the office, he observed a gray-haired stranger talking with the clerk. Tom Vance thought he knew everybody in Little Windham, and he wondered who the newcomer might be. He heard the clerk say:

"Yes, sir, she lives in the same old place, three streets to the left, around the corner. She lives all alone now. Are you a friend of hers?"

"A very old friend," was the answer. "Call me early, won't you?" He went upstairs to his room, and Tom sauntered over to the desk and examined the register.

"Jasper Vance, from Idaho, and daughter!" he read. Then he blew a low whistle and a smile spread over his face. He had spent the summers of his boyhood here in Little Windham, and he knew most of the old stories. As a prospective bridegroom his heart was brimful of sentiment, and he thought happily that maybe there was to two went out and took their way down the silent street.

The man was broad-shouldered and strong. Presently he caught up the little six-year-old girl—a fairy figure wrapped in a coat of snowy fur—and went on with great strides, carrying her.

"In a hurry, it seems!" said Tom to himself, getting into his own heavy overcoat and taking the road in his turn. He followed the two, for he was going their way. He wanted to be the first caller at the parsonage. They evidently meant to be the first callers somewhere.

They stopped, sure enough, at the little dressmaker's. Tom did not loiter, nor spy, but as he crossed the street at Miss Rivers' corner, he naturally glanced in the direction of her house. He saw her door opened, and the little girl ran over the threshold first; then the man stepped in after, and the door was closed.

Nobody can see through a heavy oaken door. But if Tom could have seen, he would have been pleased and thrilled with a fellow-feeling of sympathy. For, as Emily Rivers stood there, Jasper Vance, hat in hand, said: "Jessie, wish the lady what I told you!"

And the child's sweet voice had responded: "A Happy New Year, the happiest of all, to the best woman in the whole wide world!"

Emily Rivers bent and kissed the child. Then the child's father folded them both in his arms.

"Jasper!" said Emily Rivers. "Jasper!"

"Jasper, my dear, and nobody else, who has come across a continent to be forgiven, and to lay all he has at your feet."

Later Emily heard the story of Jasper's life since he had left Little Windham, of his marriage with an orphan girl, the daughter of his dead partner, and of his wife's death five years before this time, since when his little Jessie had known no care and attendance but his, and that of other men with rough hands and kind hearts.

There were two weddings in the parsonage that New Year's Day. One was that of Nan Gilchrist and Tom Vance, a bride and groom most beautiful in the glory of their youth. An hour after they had plighted their troth, and when the friends had spoken their congratulations, a hush suddenly fell on the throng, as a stalwart man, bronzed and gray-headed, but still in his prime, stepped from the group near the bridal party, and a little woman, in a gown of Quaker gray, was seen at his side. The second wedding was that of Jasper Vance and Emily Rivers, and the clergyman's fee for the second ceremony was paid in broad gold pieces, and was larger than that which was given him for the first.

Little Windham went home after the double reception, to begin for itself another very happy New Year.

A Sunday School in the Mountains

A correspondent writing from Chelan, Wash., tells a most interesting story of a little Sunday School in that town. It is held in an unfinished schoolhouse, built by the settlers, or rather begun by them, for it is still uncompleted. The building is made of rough lumber, and the floor is only 24x32 feet. Here, Sunday after Sunday, gathers a little band of earnest women, who bring their children, some walking many miles to be present. When the men are all out at the "Big Bend" harvest fields, the women are never absent from the Sunday School.

One woman, who lives two and a-half miles from the schoolhouse, cheerfully climbed over a mountain road every Sunday morning, carrying her youngest child in her arms. When there was preaching in the afternoon, she would go home for dinner and come back again, making ten miles over this toilsome road during the July heat. Sometimes, when their gentle old horse was not too tired, four of the children might be seen riding to Sunday School on his back, while the father and mother walked beside the patient animal.

The writer expresses a fervent wish that there were more such devoted Christians in the neighborhood. It is but a newly-settled locality, and five years ago, she, with her husband and four children, were the only white people living upon this mountain bench. The family came in August, and the next April they helped in organizing the first Sunday School in the region. Since that time they have encountered many trials and discouragements, but are yet hopeful of an abundant harvest in God's own good time. A Methodist minister, Rev. A. Y. Scag, preached in the little place three times last summer. The School is under the care of the Congregational Society, Rev. S. Greene of Seattle, State Superintendent, who often sends letters of counsel and cheer.

Congress and Mormonism

IT is evident, from the character of the testimony which is now being presented before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the Reed Smoot investigation has not lost any of its vitality in consequence of the long adjournment. Some of the testifying witnesses come from the very citadel of Mormonism, and the relentless exposure of the fraud, hypocrisy, immorality, and blasphemy of that iniquitous system, goes on in a manner that must make the leaders of the "Saints" quake with apprehension for the result. It is shown, beyond all dispute, that the principal men in the Mormon Church connive at, and personally participate in the most shameless violations of the laws, and that the manifesto prohibiting polygamy is little more than a dead letter.

It should be remembered that Senator Smoot is part and parcel of this shameless system, the existence of which is a foul blot on American civilization. He is one of the recognized heads of the Mormon Church, and is therefore equally accountable with the other leaders for its wrong-doings. If anything is to result from the present investigation, it must come largely from the Senate's recognition of the power of public opinion. In every State of the Union, Christian men and women, and the numerous church organizations, should continue the battle without cessation, and by petition and letter, urge the Senate to such action as will be a powerful rebuke to the dangerous Mormon ambition, which aims at securing a foothold in our national government. The Brigham H. Roberts' case in the House of Representatives was an excellent precedent. Smoot, though not personally a polygamist, is a far more representative Mormon than Roberts was, and his exclusion would place the Senate on record as having a proper respect for its own dignity, and for the overwhelming sentiment everywhere expressed by the American people against further tolerance of Mormon lawlessness. It is difficult to understand, in view of the startling character of the evidence—all of it confirmatory of the very worst charges that have been made against the Mormon system—how the Senate could hesitate, when the time for a decision arrives.

But there is something more than Smoot to be considered. Facts brought out during the present investigation—in which the case of Smoot has sunk to the proportions of a mere incident—have revealed the gigantic ambitions of the Mormon Church, in a way that must challenge the most serious attention of all who love this Republic, and who desire the perpetuity of its pure and noble institutions. It is unquestionable that the Mormon hierarchy constitutes a great and growing menace to our country. It is the duty of Congress to take action to put a permanent check to the growth of Mormonism as a political power.

How this is to be accomplished, and what legislation is necessary to bring the Mormon States into line with the rest of the Union, must engage the attention of Congress, and the sooner the better. In order that our readers and the country generally, may clearly grasp the situation and arrive at an intelligent conclusion, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has invited the most eminent living authority on constitutional law, the Hon. Geo. F. Edmunds, ex-United States Senator, and author of the Anti-Polygamy Act of 1882, to review the entire question at issue, and set forth before the American people, the steps necessary to be taken toward destroying the evil. Mr. Edmunds' contribution, which illuminates the whole subject, will appear in the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If his wise advice be followed, the baleful Mormon question will vanish like a hideous dream, and our land will be rid of the foul incubus that has afflicted it for half a century.

The Evil Child-Labor System

ANY one who reads the pitiful story of child labor (we might almost feel justified in saying "child slavery") in New York, which we publish on another page, will inevitably be drawn to the conclusion that the famous assumption of the founders of this Republic that "all are born free and equal," needs revision to meet the anomalous conditions of these later times. Not only in the factories of the Empire State, but in the mills of New Jersey and Massachusetts, in the coal breakers of Pennsylvania, and in the manufacturing States of the South, many thousands of tender little children are put to work almost as soon as they can lisped their letters. These pitiful little creatures hardly come into the world before they are deprived of that which ought to be the birthright of every child, the right to a free and joyous childhood, denied all opportunities of education, and doomed to toil from the very day their baby fingers can tie a thread or grasp a spool. Stunted in limb and brain, they pass through life more or less incapable of appreciating what it means.

These sad little tragedies are skilfully hidden, as far as possible, from the eye of a sympathetic public. Few men or women can resist the love of children, and were the fate of these enslaved innocents unconcealed, it would arouse a storm of indignant protest. The State Committee on Child Labor has thrown the electric light of publicity on this shameless violation of law in New York State, and has demanded of the Governor that the statutory provisions for child-labor be rigidly enforced. This demand will be universally supported.

A few years ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thoroughly exposed the child-labor systems of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and later we had the satisfaction of knowing that remedial legislation had been adopted. In New York the law is existent, though inoperative through official neglect. It must be enforced in every city, town, and village of the State.

We bespeak for the Child Labor Committee the support of all who read this appeal. The State of New York should see to it that no official is permitted to stand between it and its duty in this matter. Any one who obstructs a reform so greatly needed, should be superseded without delay.

A Wasted Life

THE life story of a man who died in New York a few days ago, deserves more than a passing notice, because he attained a position which many are vainly striving to reach. Thirty years ago he came into possession of a fortune of about a million dollars. He at once proceeded to enjoy it after his own ideas. Like the Preacher in Jerusalem, "Whatsoever his eyes desired he kept not from them and withheld not his heart from any joy." Without living a reckless or riotous life, he gave himself to pleasure. The income that came from his property was increased by judicious investments, and when it did not suffice to cover his expenses he drew upon his capital. He simply enjoyed life. Not being married, he consulted his own inclinations and went from one capital to another, to find new forms of pleasure. After thirty years his fortune was entirely dissipated, and when he died last week, he left barely sufficient to cover his funeral expenses.

It would have been interesting to learn what was his own verdict on such a life, when he came to the end. Here was a man, with abundant means at his disposal, taking up the old problem that the ancient Hebrew teacher attempted to solve thousands of years ago. He went out to seek happiness by the old and hackneyed path of sensual gratification. We do not believe he found it. The conditions of our time have not so changed that men can find it in that way, any more than they could in bygone times. The constitution of man has not changed. He is still body, soul and spirit, and men have proved in every age, by painful experience, that the gratification of the senses is of the most evanescent kind, and speedily produces satiety. To voluntarily devote the life to pleasure is to become a mere animal. The body, pampered and indulged, sinks into the grave, and the spirit starved and attenuated, has lost its proper growth and development. Even on the lowest ground of the best that can be made of the present life, the plan of seeking happiness through pleasure is a failure. Not so can man be happy. The highest pleasures are spiritual pleasures, and they are the most enduring.

Comparing such a life with that of the humblest and poorest Christian worker, the result is poor beyond expression. God has so constituted human nature that only by reaching up toward him can one attain true manhood. He who, whatever the circumstances of his lot, strives to become God-like, has pleasures that the world can never give, nor take away. By striving to help others, by laboring for the world's betterment, by alleviating the sorrows and burdens of those around him, so can a man enjoy true happiness. To such a man, there is more joy in the blessing that comes upon him from saving "him that is ready to perish," than the mere worldly ever experiences. Real happiness, even in this life, comes from usefulness; and at the close, there is the prospect of divine satisfaction, the joy of being in that presence where there are pleasures forever more.

Good-Bye, Old Year!

THE division of time into months and years is purely arbitrary; time itself flowing on and on forever in an unending stream, until it is merged in eternity. Yet these divisions are very convenient. How should we keep the records of our lives, how mark the progress of nations, if we had no dates of years and centuries? Good-bye, old year! Nineteen hundred and four, like all its predecessors, has been eventful in world history, has had its chronicle of births and deaths, of loss and gain, of hurricane and flood, of invention and discovery, and, on the whole, has most creditably borne itself, and compares most favorably with the years that have gone before. Good-bye, old year!

The future historian will devote much time and space to that part of the year's panorama which is concerned with the mighty struggle in the Far East. If ever there was a conflict of Titans, this is one. If ever there has been a contest in which most people felt strongly that the balance of right was more on one side than the other, this is one. The heroic and long protracted defence of Port Arthur, has been equalled by the magnificent and well-nigh invincible valor of the attacking forces. The heroism and patriotism of the Japanese, has never been surpassed at any period, or by any people. The world has stood aghast at the wholesale destruction of human life, and at the fearful devastation of property. Whatever be the issue, for years and years to come, both of the warring nations will suffer terribly in their material resources, and be burdened financially with tremendous debts.

As for the heart-history of this fearful war, who shall write it? Who shall count the widows and the orphans, the aged people bereft of sons, and the wounded who must go halt and maimed for the rest of their lives?

As our own General Sherman said, "War is cruel, and you cannot refine it."

Would that in some day of the future, its dire necessity might cease, and peaceful arbitration take its place. But that day is not yet. Nations and men will still fight for the supremacy, and an open port, or a country rich in gold and copper, or any other great material resource, will, as now, be a cause for war. Good-bye, Old Year, and all hail, New Year!

"The King is dead. Long live the King." None of us can predict with any certainty what the New Year will bring us, but we all hope for great things in nineteen hundred and five. May it be a year of blessing to us all? It surely will be this, if we take whatever comes in simple faith, from the good hand of our God. Years come, and years go, but heaven's light is forever over us all, and they are the happiest and most content who live always just one day at a time.

If our hearts were but more simple,
We should take Him at his word.
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

Peril of a Famous Church

CABLE messages from Italy report that one of the most famous historic edifices in Europe, that of St. Mark's Church in Venice, is threatened with collapse. When the Campanile fell on July 14, 1902, architects were appointed to examine the foundations of other ancient buildings. Among them, St. Mark's Church, of which the Campanile was a part, was to be carefully examined. It was feared that the causes which had led to the destruction of the famous bell-tower, might have affected the foundations of the church. The report now rendered by the architects proves that the fear was justified. It sets forth that the condition of the Basilica is most alarming. The whole building shows weakness. The foundations are bending and cracking, the walls are sinking, and the ceilings of two of the vaults threaten to give way. If they fall it may cause most of the Basilica to collapse. The architects recommend the immediate erection of scaffolding and a restoration of the whole building, including the foundations.

St. Mark's, as every reader of Ruskin knows, is a building of exquisite beauty. It stands alone among the edifices of the world in respect of its unequalled richness of material and decoration; and also from the fact that it has been constructed with the spoils of countless other buildings, and therefore forms a museum of sculpture of the most varied kind. It was erected in 1071, replacing a more ancient church on the same site, which was built in 813 and was destroyed by fire in 976. Its walls were of brick, but they were faced inside and outside with precious colored marbles and porphyries and by glass mosaics on gold grounds. Plain white marble was used only for sculpture and then thickly covered with gold. The various marbles are arranged in broad, upright bands, alternating so that one color enhances the effect of that next to it. From time to time additions were made to it until now it is a miracle of matchless splendor.

The present peril is believed to be due to a shifting of the strata of clay and sand on which Venice is built. This has left the brick foundations exposed and the bricks have decayed. It may be hoped that the neglect which led to the fall of the Campanile, after similar conditions were discovered, will not be repeated in the case of St. Mark's, the loss of which would be deplored by the whole world. Happily, no such catastrophe can ever befall the true Church of Christ. Whatever may happen to the superstructure which men have erected on the one Foundation, there can be no possibility of that Foundation ever decaying, for it is Christ himself.

If any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble ; the day shall declare it (1. Cor. 3 : 12, 13).

Fadeless Flowers

The wonders of floriculture already achieved by the famous florist, Luther Burbank of San Francisco, have reached their culmination, if a telegram from that city is substantiated, in a new discovery. It is of a flower whose blossoms never fade. The fragrant flowers are of a crimson shade, sometimes approaching white. They are produced in large, graceful clusters, which, when cut, will retain their form and color permanently. The full-grown plants are about one foot high, and the same across. Although the stem of the flower may dry up, the blossoms will not fade. Mr. Burbank has a cluster of these blossoms in his library, which have remained there unchanged for a year. The report says that he evolved the plant by crossing and recrossing upon a hardy annual which grows in Western Australia. It will now, he believes, grow in any light, sandy loam, blooming early in the season, and continuing to bloom for a long time. If this claim proves true, the metaphor of the prophet will have to be revised, with the new flower as an exception, but hitherto the life of the flower has been the symbol of a fact which still remains true.

The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall stand forever (Isa. 40: 8).

Minute Real Estate

A sale of a strip of land in New York caused some amusement in the real-estate market last week. The owner has held it for over twenty years. It lies between Seventy-second Street and Seventy-third Street and is only two inches in width and ninety-four feet in depth. It came into his possession through an error in surveying. He has held it, hoping that at some time it would become valuable to the owner of the property on one side or the other. At last, he put it on the market to ascertain what it would bring. Immediately there were a number of bidders. It was finally bought by a real estate agent, who promptly sold it to another purchaser at a profit of $120. What he will do with it was not disclosed. It is difficult to understand what value so small a strip can have to anyone, but it is said that the possession even of so minute a portion of New York was coveted by many. It is much to be wished that they were as eager to obtain title to a possession in the heavenly city, which is freely offered to them and which can never be taken away.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, VENICE, NOW THREATENED WITH COLLAPSE

Now they desire a better country, that is a heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city (Heb. 11: 16).

Cracks in the Moon

A new discovery in our satellite is announced by Prof. Perrine of the Lick Observatory. It is in the nature of a crack in the moon's crust, or of a dry river bed, only a few hundred feet in width, extending through the centre of the valley, which is known to astronomers as "the valley of the Alps." It is eighty miles in length, extending lengthwise over the face of the moon. It can be seen only under good atmospheric conditions and when the sun is shining upon it at the proper angle. Prof. Pickering, of Harvard, who is a well-known authority on all questions relating to the moon, says, "The crack is caused by a contraction of the crust of the moon," and he has himself observed similar cracks or fissures in several other portions of the moon's surface, though never in the high latitudes near the poles. Though we are accustomed to regard the moon as a dead world and no evidences of life have been observed upon it, it is evident that there are natural forces at work upon it which in their action are akin to earthquakes. These natural forces are only another name for the Creator's power, which is still manifest even in this extinct world.

Whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend into heaven, thou art there (Ps. 139: 7, 8).

Diamonds in the Gutter

A black and white photograph of a large, ornate building, likely a cathedral or opera house. The building features multiple arches and a prominent spire. The image is somewhat faded and has a vintage appearance.

Let him know that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins (James 5: 20).

BRIEF NOTES

The Empress of China is building for herself a magnificent tomb, which it is estimated will cost four million dollars.

The marriage of the German Crown Prince has been fixed for March 22d next, which will be the hundred-and-eighth anniversary of the birth of his great-grandfather, Emperor William I.

Stonewall Jackson Christian, grandson of Stonewall Jackson, the great Confederate leader, who was a devout Christian, has been appointed by President Roosevelt a Cadet at West Point.

The births in France last year were 25,000 fewer than in 1902, when they were 12,000 fewer than in the previous year. While the population in France is steadily declining, that in Germany is increasing by a million a year.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond is now making his fourth tour of the State of Nebraska. In almost every town Christians are found who date their conversion from his former visits. He remains three days in a town, visits the public school, and invites all to attend his meetings. Many have been brought to Christ during this tour.

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

"BUT the question. What did you want to ask, brother?" said Stanton. "Pardon me, but I think I owe you an apology. I thought you were one of these men who try to break up a meeting with useless arguments. I know now, that you are not that kind." He smiled at the family circle, and with that smile he caught the affections, forever, of the entire simple, deep-hearted household of Franz Stollwitz.

"Well, Dr. Stanton, all I wanted to ask was—" He broke down with his big laugh, as if it had an explosive quality in it that had the properties of dynamite, and exerted its force in all directions equally. "All I wanted to ask was if you were married yourself, and knew what you were talking about from actual knowledge. Would that have broken up the meeting?"

"I'm afraid it would," said Stanton laughing, while Mrs. Stollwitz eyed her big husband reproachfully.

"Well, when the crowd yelled sit down, and called me crank, that raised one crop of dauber on me, and I tried to make my question heard, but the people around me were fools, and then I forgot my English, and talked German, so you did not understand. When I get excited, sometimes, I forget all English. Then I need a— what you call 'em—an interrupter. Then Katrina pulled my coat, and I went away."

"She was a good interrupter," said Stanton with a twinkle.

"Yah," said Franz gravely. "Katrina knows when it is good to keep still. But how about that, Dr. Stanton? Be you one married man?"

"Indeed I am, friend, and very happily so. I have her picture here, and I am willing to have you judge if she is not the sweetest-faced woman in the world."

He took out the little case with its photograph, that he had told Mildred he should always carry with him on his lecture trips, and it was passed from hand to hand, provoking exclamations of delight. Stollwitz nodded gravely.

"Ach! You have a right to make a few remarks on the question of marriage. She is one handsome woman. She is of the Lord, my friend."

"Thank you," said Stanton, deeply touched. All through that simple meal it seemed to him that he had been drawing near something elementally simple, and at the same time fundamental. It struck him that Stollwitz and his family might be of the stuff that epics are woven out of, and that these yellow-haired, grave-eyed children might lay claim, sometime, to richer heritage for blessing than the sons and daughters of the upper circles, where simplicity and elemental virtues have been choked and killed by the artificial customs of society.

When he rose to go away, Stollwitz pulled a book out of a little shelf behind the door.

"We read your book aloud, Dr. Stanton, Katrina and I. It helped us. I would have stayed last night to tell you so, but the troubles at the mill made it needful for me to go to my place earlier. That is what Katrina came to call me about. God bless you! Come and see us again."

He shook hands heartily with all the members of the family, and when he came to baby Katherine, he kissed her, while the tears came into the eyes of big Stollwitz and his wife. They watched him until he turned the corner by the mill, and he went his way thanking God for the little chapter that had become a part of the book of his own life.

His engagements took him away from Lenox for nearly two weeks, and when he returned one evening, he came home with a varied experience that he anticipated telling to his wife. On the whole, the people had received him kindly, and he had some reason to believe that his message had met with a response from the people. There had been some opposition. At one or two places, people in the audience, angered at his plain statements, had gone out of the meeting, and others had let him feel their opposition by means of letters or speech. But for the most part, the signs of a growing promise for the growing Brotherhood, seemed bright to him, and he rejoiced with a glow of hope in the good report he was able to make to his wife.

The minute he got out of the train at Lenox, he was aware of some very unusual disturbance in the town. The air was charged with high excitement. Looking over into the great public square near the passenger depot, he was thrilled at the sight of a dense mob gathered about a negro, who was standing on a great pile of wood, which seemed to be composed of railroad ties, pieces of sidewalk, broken drygoods boxes and barrels.

At the foot of this pile, an insane mob surged like demons, striking at the negro's figure with clubs, axes, bars from piping torn from the little depot flower-garden plot. Other men were pouring something on the wood at the negro's feet.

"What is it?" Stanton asked of no one in particular. The horror of a deep inhuman act struck him with a chill of intense numbing pain. He had a sudden nausea, and his temples throbbed heavily.

"They are going to burn him alive, and serve him right," the station-master said, with an oath.

"They shall not do it if there is a God in heaven!" Stanton leaped off the platform edge and ran across the flower-plot towards the scene. As he ran, he sobbed to himself, "It is Christian America! Oh God, for Christ's sake, forbid it. They know not what they do!"

CHAPTER V

THE next moment Stanton had fought his way into the mob and was pleading with it, not knowing what he said, only pouring out a passionate torrent of words, entreating, threatening, commanding. He was astonished to note in the crowd some of the most prominent business and professional men in Lenox, swept off their feet by the frenzy of the mob spirit. One of these men roughly shoved Stanton aside as he flung an armful of wood down on the awful pile rising around the negro, who was chained to a street-car rail.

"He murdered a white man and woman down on the Wood road behind the mills, Dr. Stanton."

"I didn't do it! I am not guilty!" shrieked the poor wretch, writhing in the chain that had been wound around his body. And as Stanton gazed on him, he recognized the negro who had fought for life the night of the riot between the union and the non-union men.

"Let the courts do their work! Don't murder an innocent man!" shouted Stanton. His voice was like a child's in the midst of the yelling demons in that hell-possessed square. Someone flung a lighted newspaper on the oil-soaked wood. It blazed up at once, and the negro screamed in a cry so frightful, that for a moment those nearest his figure fell back.

Stanton flung himself on the blaze, and with feet and hands scattered the pieces of wood, crying aloud as he did so, calling on the men to let the law take its course. The next moment he was caught and flung back. Several strong arms held him, while the mob threw the fagots around the wretch and set them afire again. As the blaze curled up around his feet a pistol shot rang out, then a second and a third. The negro's head dropped, his body sank down, an inert mass held up by the chain, and the flames and smoke rolled around him, for a moment hiding the fearful object from sight.

That was all Stanton remembered, mercifully for him, until he came to himself, to find that he was lying on the grass-plot of the railroad flower-park with Harvey bending over him. Afterwards he learned that Harvey had dragged him out of the crowd in a fainting condition and perhaps saved his life.

Harvey was kneeling between Stanton and the smouldering heap of nameless horror in the square. The mob was fighting to get up to that awful heap to secure souvenirs of the evening.

"Surely, God will take vengeance on the people for this night's dreadful deed," groaned Stanton feebly.

"If there is a God," replied Harvey roughly. "I have my doubts about it. But you've done your duty."

"It has not availed anything," Stanton exclaimed faintly. "But I believe in a God if you don't, Harvey, and I know he will visit this city with punishment for this outrage."

"The man and women were killed by someone down on the Wood road, and the negro was found near the scene under suspicious circumstances. Someone had to be sacrificed to the desire for vengeance."

"I believe he was innocent," groaned Stanton. "His guiltless blood will cry out against us from the ground. And think of the eyes that have been ruined by the sight of this horror. How can they ever behold anything pure or holy again?"

"Come on home, Stanton. You can't do anything more here. Are you fit to walk?" Harvey helped him to his feet and went home with him, Stanton, all the way, hanging his head in shame for Lenox, and when Mildred greeted him he broke down under the strain as she put her arms about him and mingled her grief with his over the awful event.

To the credit of the Lenox Times next day, it denounced the action of the mob in a vigorous editorial, and called attention to the fact, that if the after-facts should prove the victim to be innocent, he would be the nineteenth negro to be lynched within six months within the United States, eleven of whom were innocent of the crime attributed to them. "Even supposing this man to be guilty," the editorial continued, "the mob spirit is the mark of barbarism. It is, however, becoming alarmingly common. There is no doubt the courts are largely to blame for it. The law's delays have been notorious. Especially is it true that justice has often been defeated, and guilty men permitted to go free when the accused has been a person of wealth or influence. This fact is, no doubt, responsible to a large degree for the presence of the mob in American life to-day. The people have grown to have a deep distrust of the regular court proceedings. The remedy for lynch law is an incorruptible court which acts promptly, not depriving any man of a fair opportunity to prove his innocence, but without permitting delays on technical points of law, and upon convictions, at once meting out punishment in keeping with the crime."

Stanton rested quietly at home during the day, heartsore over the disgrace and shame that had fallen on the town. After supper Harvey called, with news of serious nature.

"It's as you said, Dr. Stanton. The negro was innocent. The guilty man was found late this afternoon by Sheriff Johns, who was absent last night in Anson county. If he had been here the mob would not have been possible, I believe. You know Johns. He's the best sheriff we ever had. The minute news came of the murder on the Wood road, he started out. He got a clue that took him over into Anson county. Sheriff Raines joined him, and the man was brought to bay in a barn. He confessed his guilt, but shot himself dead before he could be caught. That's the story that all the town is talking over to-night. If it's true—"

"If it's true," Stanton exclaimed, as he walked up and down in front of Harvey, "this town is guilty of a fearful crime before God. Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

"The Lord is the only one who will repay," muttered Harvey.

"Do you mean to say," exclaimed Mildred in horror at Harvey's inference, "that this negro's murder will go unpunished in the courts? Why, father is Judge of the District Court. Do you mean—?"

"Your father is the soul of honor, Mrs. Stanton," said Harvey quietly. "He is the fairest judge in some ways that ever sat on the bench. And yet, you will pardon me for saying it, he has repeatedly, in the course of his long service in the District Court, permitted laws delayed on technicalities, where he might and should lawfully have ruled for a swifter and surer justice. Besides, in this case, the judge is powerless if the County Attorney does not bring action. And if anyone supposes that County Attorney Paley will ever bring any against the mob—"

He left his sentence unfinished with a contempt that was deeper than words could make it, and Stanton gravely eyed him and his wife, conscious that Harvey spoke the truth.

"Does anyone wonder," said Harvey gloomily, "that some of us want to see a different order of society in the world from the one we've got now? Will you say, Stanton, that under the present monopolistic, plutocratic rule the people get justice in any large quantity? The men around poor Bill Warren last night, some of them were among the best known men in Lenox. You see if any of them are ever arrested for this crime. Yet if some poor striker breaks a law, he's jacked up without any delay and punished to the limit. J. B. Wrightam breaks a dozen laws of the State every day of his life, and no one interferes. That's because he's a millionaire. He drives his automobile through the streets of Lenox twice as fast as the ordinance says is lawful, but who ever heard of his being arrested? If I were to drive a horse a fraction beyond the speed allowed, you know I would hear from it quick enough. It is just such facts that makes Socialists. And the lawless rich will have themselves to blame one of these days if they wake up some fine morning to a new order of things, in which they shall be obliged to obey the laws or suffer the consequences."

"It will never be along the track of compulsion or hatred, Brother Harvey."

"I don't care along what track it comes, so long as it gets here," Harvey replied, as he got up to go. "But you mark my prophecy. Not a man that helped murder Bill Warren will ever suffer for it from Lenox justice."

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay," saith the Lord," murmured Stanton sadly, as Harvey went out. "The world is in the hands of a just God. If not now inevitably, sometime, every evil deed of selfish men shall receive its just punishment."

"I'd like to see some of it handed out now," said Harvey with his grim smile. "I'm tired of waiting for eternity to even things up."

"God has waited longer than you have!" replied Stanton, a little sternly. Harvey stared and seemed about to answer, but finally went away without speaking.

Next morning the Lenox Times had a full story of Sheriff Johns, and his attempted capture of the real criminal. There was no doubt that the mob had murdered an innocent man. The Times called for action on the part of Paley, the County Attorney, and vigorously declared that the town and county were disgraced unless something was done. It spoke in high praise of Dr. Stanton's conduct, and urged its readers to denounce mob rule, and stand together for law and order.

The following Sunday, several pulpits in Lenox spoke out plainly, and called on the courts and authorities to take action against the mob. Stanton himself, by invitation from one of the ministers, preached that Sunday on the all absorbing topic. Never had he been so effective. A vast audience crowded the church.

It was deeply moved by his eloquent appeal for a social righteousness. Apparently his words carried deep conviction. Hundreds stayed after the service to thank him for his message, and assure him of their hearty belief in the truth of what he had so forcibly stated.

Yet it is simply matter of plain history of this case in Lenox, in the year of our Lord 1903, and in so-called Christian America, nothing was ever done really to bring the murderers of Bill Warren, the negro, to trial. The County Attorney went through the form of arresting a few people, but the cases were finally dismissed for lack of evidence; and even in the face of an indignation meeting called by Stanton and a few public-spirited men, the farce of justice was fully played out by the County Attorney, and not one man of the hundreds guilty of that awful crime was ever punished by the laws of man. This is matter of history which is not denied. And the place of it is not Turkey or Macedonia, with its heathen and unchristian atrocities, but Christian America, with its churches, schools, colleges, and culture, inheriting its wealth of Pilgrim and Puritan conviction. Is it true, think you, young and thoughtful citizens of the United States, that the age of deep convictions has gone, and that we are living in an age of selfish greed and political graft, so intense that one man like this County Attorney of Lenox County, a man devoid of patriotic sense and of reverence for law, drawing his pay as the main thing in his office, practically stands a thing of colossal insult to the State to thwart the majesty of justice, and with cowardly wickedness pour contempt and shame on the principles for which the framers of the Declaration of Independence pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor?

Whatever you may think about it, the facts remain grim and unchanged. Let every lover of his country, and every believer in the law and its enforcement, note the facts on his knees, holding up his hands before God in prayer, that a new generation may arise with a righteous zeal for a Christian Republic in reality as well as in name.

How much this event contributed to deepen Stanton's convictions in the line of his belief in social revolution, it would be difficult to say. Undoubtedly it intensified his feelings and added to his passionate desire for a new patriotism. This found expression in his next public address in Chicago. He was called there by the Municipal League, and the Auditorium was packed to hear him. It was a representative audience, composed of Labor, Capital, professional and business men, all interested in his theme, most of them drawn by curiosity to see the author of The Christian Socialist; some hostile to him, others indifferent, but all, for the time being, more or less roused by the occasion.

Stanton began by stating the subject of the evening's address:

"I have been asked," he said, "to outline the programme of Christian Socialism. It is useless for me to make even a beginning toward what I want to say, unless the first principles on which a proposed social order rest are plainly understood."

"I wish it to be distinctly understood, therefore, that I do not attempt to bring into this discussion any other economic theories than those which have been so plainly stated in the Bible, and especially in the New Testament. A good many people are frightened at society, will not, in itself, be enough to bring about an ideal social order among men. Men themselves need first of all to be right before they will live right. This does not ignore the fact that surroundings or environment have their influence in shaping men's moral or religious conditions. But merely to attempt to improve men's physical conditions and ignore their spiritual needs, as if all had been done when the body has been well-clothed, fed, and housed, is to ignore the fact that men in all the centuries who have had the best environment, but whose hearts have been sinful, are among the most unhappy and sinful men in the world's history. Having money, living in a big house, eating rich food, being educated, all this does not mean happiness or power. If what the world of labor is after to-day is more money, more food, better houses, more things, as if these things would bring happiness, then it will miss the mark, and even if by a legislative revolution it should gain all these things but still remain unchanged in the heart, the world will be no better off than it is now. In fact, if all the people who are now living in tenements, all the people who are working at hard labor, all the people who are poor and in debt and worn out with the struggle for existence, should be able to exchange their condition with the rich, go into their houses, have their money to spend, and be released from the conditions which they now regard as bitter, the world would not be any better off, unless the people who benefited by the physical change were also changed at heart. The good house, the fine clothes, the money, the surroundings, would not in themselves necessarily make any of these people any happier, any more useful, or more of value to society. It would be bread, but it would be bread alone. And 'man shall not live by bread alone.' Out of the heart proceed all the evil things of the world. The rich are as miserable as the poor if their hearts are not right with God. Christian Socialism simply repeats the command of Jesus, 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things—that is, the physical things you need—shall be added unto you.' The Socialism which says, 'seek first better wages; seek first more money; seek first how to get the better of your enemies; seek first trade-unionism; seek first how to down Capitalism or how to enact laws against human selfishness,' this Socialism, no matter what else it may be, is not Christian. There is only one first for the Christian, and that is the Kingdom of God.

"3. This does not mean that Christian Socialism has no definite aim or purpose in the matter of changing unjust or unhappy physical conditions of society. Any man who really is seeking first God's Kingdom, will do all in his power to make the physical life as comfortable and happy as he can. Because the Christian makes his first object in life the building up of the Kingdom of God, is the best possible reason why he is the one kind of a man in the whole world to help successfully to establish a just and happy social condition. Christian Socialism, therefore, believes in the following practical measures.

"4. Christian Socialism believes in the common ownership or control of all the world's great necessities. This includes such common physical needs as transportation, local and general; oil, coal, food, water, light, telegraph, telephone, express and postal conveniences. Such common necessities as ice, bread, milk, medicine, etc., could easily be furnished all the people at cost, under an intelligent, loving, social order which was really Christian. I was present in the London Common Council one day, when Lord Carrington rose and made a statement concerning the cost of gas to the poor of London, as furnished by the London Gas and Coke Company, an absolutely monopolistic concern. The company charged the poor of London nine pence more per thousand feet of gas than they charged him, Lord Carrington. Lord Carrington afterwards declared his abhorrence of any such injustice, and prophesied a final socializing of such a common necessity. The difference in price was on account of the difference in quantity of gas consumed."

"HE CAME TO HIMSELF ON THE GRASS PLOT, WITH HARVEY BENDING OVER HIM"

the sound of the very word Socialism. But I wish to announce in this talk to-night, that according to my view, and that of hundreds and thousands of far better Christians than myself, the term Christian Socialism is nothing but a term which means, that if the plain teachings of the Son of God were obeyed in human society, the world would begin to enjoy a peace, a strength, a prosperity, a brotherhood, such as it does not now know. If this is true, as I firmly believe it is, then the statements I am about to make are simply and forever based on the teachings of Jesus, and are not any new or striking or original contribution to the Social Problem; only the direct application of divine laws to human needs, as old as creation, but made clear and specific by Him who came on purpose to give men life abundantly.

"The programme of Christian Socialism, therefore, may be stated under the following heads:

"1. Before anything like a Christian Social order among men is possible, men must be Christian.

"It is not enough that they be merely good men, that is, men who are moral or who never commit crime. They must be men who are filled with the spirit of Christ, intelligent, well-poised, self-sacrificing, loving their enemies, ready to forgive wrongs, strong to endure, patient, calm, making it the business of their lives to seek first the Kingdom of God. There is no real hope of establishing the Christian Social order with any other human material.

"2. If this proposition is true, it follows, that making laws or trying to establish legislative rules to govern

THE GREAT FORERUNNER

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

AS this is the only lesson on John the Baptist in these six months about Jesus, we may well recall the whole life of the man behind the witnessing here described. Indeed the most important thing about any witnessing is the character of the witness. The lips must be backed up by the life. John was twice declared to be "great." It makes a difference who gives that witness. Who did? First, the angel that promised this child to his parents (Luke 1: 15), said, "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord," and later, when John had fulfilled the angel's promise, Jesus proclaimed him "great" (Matt. 11: 11). That settles it. The most reasonable thing any mortal can do is to accept the word of Christ as final, and use his own imperfect reason only on the questions of which the perfect Reasoner has not spoken. But in what was John truly great?

1.—Because He Fulfilled God's Plan. Isaiah and Malachi foretold the coming of John the Baptist as a second Elijah, careless of comforts but full of courage, a herald of Christ, who should go before him crying, "Prepare the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40: 3, 4; Mal. 4: 5). And when the time had almost come the angel Gabriel told the aged woman who thought her home was never to be gladdened with a child, that she was to give the world this promised forerunner of Jesus: "Thou shalt have joy and gladness and many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink no wine or strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Spirit. And many of the children of Israel shall be turned unto the Lord their God. And he shall go before his face in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to walk in the wisdom of the just; to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him" (Luke 1: 14-17).

His mother and father and the child himself all helped God to the utmost to fulfil that wonderful promise. But do not forget that every child's life is a plan of God, and that a part of that "plan" is that you should be good and do good. Can we all be great as well as good? Yes; by linking our names with Christ as John did, they shall become immortally glorious in his reflected light, in heaven if not on earth. If John the Baptist had not been the humble servant of Jesus we should none of us know that such a man ever lived. Even on earth those whose honors abide, are the good who were also "good for something." Who knows the names of the richest men of John's time? Even the public officers of that day are not generally known to the people of to-day, except those whose names were linked with Christ as friends or enemies. Can you name any rulers of that age except the Herods and Pilates and others who were some way related to Christ? It is the good that are honorably remembered by God and man.

2. Because he was filled with the right spirit. What a long delusion lies in the name "spirit," as applied to that which comes into human nature not to strengthen but to weaken! Of thirty-two young men examined in a recent year in New York City for cadetships, only nine were physically sound. Does any one suppose the other twenty-three were rejected because they abstained, as John the Baptist did? John was an abstainer all his life. There were "Nazirites" who took the pledge only for a limited period, but he "pledged perpetual hate to all that can intoxicate." He did not stop, as some temperance people do, with barring out the wrong "spirit"—he also admitted the right Spirit. And let neither parents nor children overlook the fact that he was born of the Spirit, as was Jeremiah also (Jer. 1: 9), at the very beginning of his life. He was a Christian from the cradle, as every child might be if parents were prayerful and faithful. The first choice between right and wrong may be a right one, as surely as the second one may be, or the hundredth. And until a wrong choice is made, the child of prayer is surely the child of God.

3. His was also a fearless "voice" against sin and for salvation by the Cross. John, having been foretold by two prophets, and Gabriel, the prince of angels, and being descended on both sides from Aaron, the brother of Moses, and belonging not only to God's chosen people, but also to the Levites, the highest in rank of them all, might naturally have been proud of his blood and station. And his superior morality and spirituality might have added to his self-esteem. But when his moral and spiritual childhood had ripened into young manhood, and he had entered on his appointed work as a preacher of righteousness, though great popularity as a preacher to unprecedented crowds of rich and poor again offered occasion for self-regard, he replied to those who thought he must be the Messiah: "I am only the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (vv. 1: 19-23). That saying is characteristic of John's whole life, and of all who in the Bible speak and write for God. They all stand as Joseph before Pharaoh, saying: "It is not in me; God shall give you an answer of peace." See II Sam. 23: 2; Isa. 1: 10 (repeated twenty times); Jer. 1: 4; Ezek. 1: 3;

IN THOSE DAYS CAME JOHN THE BAPTIST, PREACHING

THE WILDERNESS OF JUDEA, THE SCENE OF JOHN THE BAPTIST'S PREACHING

3: 10, 11 (repeated sixty times); Dan. 9: 2; 10: 9; Hos. 1: 1; Joel 1: 1, etc.

In the second section of the lesson, the humility of John the Baptist comes out in deeper lines, when being asked about his baptism of repentance (vv. 25-28), he answered that a greater baptism of the Spirit would be given them by the Master whom he heralded, of whom he was not worthy to loose the sandals as his lowliest servant. Not worthy to be his servant, and yet he dared to call himself "the friend of the Bridegroom," is another unconscious picture of his self-forgetfulness. When the crowds John the Baptist had gathered left him to hear

Jesus, and the jealous friends of the former complained, John answered, comparing himself to the bridegroom's friend, that goes before him to arrange all things with the bride's family: "He that hath the Bride, the Church, is the Bridegroom, Christ, and I who am only the friend of the Bridegroom, delight to get away into the shadow and rejoice greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice, talking with his happy Bride. He must increase and I must decrease" (John 3: 25-30). Why does not some great artist picture this wonderful conception, the masterpiece of humility? Few men ever became great enough to retire so early, and so cheerfully from the front of the stage when the good of the cause required it. It is such humble men, who are willing to be forgotten, that the world will not forget. And even Though they may forget the singer,

They will not forget the song.

To be a "voice" for God that shall be heard, whether we are "heard of" or not, let that be our Christian ambition. A certain man used to pray now and then in prayer-meeting, but in so low a voice that no one could tell what he said. The pastor thought it was because he had a feeble voice, until one day he stepped into his store and heard his orders to his clerk ring out all through the store: "John, bring up that fifty pounds of flour!" "Alas!" said his pastor, "he can only whisper for God, but in business he has a mighty voice."

Lord, speak to me—that I may speak
In living echoes of thy tone!
As thou hast sought, so let me seek Thy erring children, lost and lone.

Oh, fill me with thy fulness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word
Thy love to tell, thy praise to show!

One day at sea, the writer was pondering the saying of Christ that of those born before him none was greater than John the Baptist. He did not seem so great as that, then. But after spending that whole day reading all that is said about him by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and beholding three great Bible pictures of him as Hero, Faithful Witness and Friend of the Bridegroom, the words of Christ seemed none too strong.

John the Hero. Let us then look upon the Bible picture of John the Baptist as a hero, second to none that has lived. Behold him standing before a multitude of excitable Jews, easily roused to passion; plainly—almost personally—pointing out their sins and urging them to repentance. Still more: See him when the Pharisees of his audience congratulate themselves that his denunciations of sin are not for such righteous men as themselves, looking them equally in the eye and inquiring: "O generation of vipers (they expected rather this greeting: "O models of righteousness"), who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" And then, as he sees their inward confidence in their ancestors' piety instead of their own, he adds, pointing to the smooth pebbles at his feet: "Say not ye, we have Abraham to our Father, for I say unto you God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And now also the ax is laid unto the roots of the trees: therefore every tree that beareth not good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire," as if he had said: "The dispensation has come when leaves of profession and form will not suffice. There will be a looking at the root, the heart itself and among the branches for fruit. The new Gardener will say of every tree that has nothing but leaves: 'Cut it down! Why cumbereth it the ground?'"

It has been said that the symbol of John, as suggested by this last passage, should be an ax. Bravely did he swing the gleaming ax in the forest of hypocrisy, corruption and indifference, "making straight in the desert a highway for our God."

But the picture of his grandest courage would present him calm and bold in the presence of one who wore a crown and the tinselry of royalty, declaring, in spite of dungeon and death before him, the lust and wickedness, and treason to God's law that this Herod had shown in marrying his brother Philip's wife. While the word Herod has become almost the synonym of hatred as we say, "it outherods Herod," the world would fain write on the old castle of Machærus, to which John's fidelity condemned him, the inscription, "The Palace of Heroism."

EVANGELICAL WORK IN BULGARIA

SOFIA, the capital of Bulgaria, is a fast-growing city. From a dirty provincial Turkish town of twenty-five or thirty thousand inhabitants, its population has grown to eighty thousand, and the city is entirely Europeanized since the liberation of Bulgaria, when it was selected capital of the principality. The stranger visiting Sofia can see here and there remnants of the old city. The old, low and tumble-down buildings are replaced by commodious dwellings and business houses. Crooked and narrow lanes have given way to straight, well macadamized streets. The abundant supply of excellent water from Mt. Vitosha, the sewerage system, the electric lights and the trolleys remind the Western visitor that Bulgaria is in Europe, and that the Bulgarians are not altogether Orientals.

Just before the Russo-Turkish War in 1877, Protestant work was begun in this city by the Bulgarian Evangelical Society, which opened a Bible depot, and its agent was required, in addition to his other duties, to conduct evangelical services. Previous to this, the city had been visited by missionaries, colporteurs and transient preachers, but no Protestant community had as yet been organized. The agent of the Bulgarian Evangelical Society soon gathered a small congregation of ten to fifteen members, who met for regular service in a small tailor shop. There was a front window, but they dared not open it on account of the disturbing elements that might break up the service. The number of inquirers after the truth steadily increased. An old house was purchased, affording a more commodious place for worship. Later, this house was taken by the city for improvement purposes, and a more central site was purchased, and a new church building erected. The work has rapidly grown since then. For a number of years its entire support came from the Bulgarian Evangelical Society. Then the community began to raise part of the pastor's salary, the balance being given by the American Mission in Samokov. When Pastor Popoff took up the pastorate of this church thirteen years ago, he found a congregation of some one hundred and forty. Now the average attendance at our morning and evening services is about three hundred. The membership is more than doubled. The Sofia church has become practically self-supporting.

A large number of those that attend the services are non-Protestant. Frequently Government officials, military officers, soldiers and others come to hear the preaching of the Gospel. Many come from provincial towns, who are in Sofia on business.

By means of its Sunday School, its Temperance Society, its Y. M. C. A., its Ladies' Aid Society and similar organizations, it is leavening with Gospel truth not only the population of the capital, but the entire nation. It is the only evangelical church in Sofia where the Gospel is preached in the vernacular.

The building is greatly out of repair. It will require an outlay of from $2,000 to $3,000, and the members have already started a subscription for the purpose. Any one who is interested in the work can address M. N. Popoff, Ulitza Solun 18, Sofia, Bulgaria.

Answered Prayers

BELIEVE IN GOD

O H, doubting child,
Dear one, weighed down with care,
Be reconciled:
For Jesus answers prayer.

When sorrows come,
And when temptation's near,
Go thou and pray:
Through prayer comes Christ's good cheer.

Fear not life's woes,
God is a Father kind;
How tenderly
He leadeth home the blind.

If 'tis not now,
But in the coming years,
Faint not, believe;
God wipes away your tears.

Sometime 'twill come,
The answer longed for most,
Be brave, dear child,
Stand firmly at your post.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. L. M., Auburn, N. Y. Do you think that a person who has been deserted, has a right to remarry?

If a divorce has been obtained from the courts, we believe that the person deserted, having clear proof that the partner who has gone away has violated the marriage vows, has the right to remarry. It would be an odious injustice for an innocent person to be punished for the wrong-doing of another. The marriage is dissolved by the act of the deserting partner, and it sets the other partner free. Matt. 5: 32 shows that Christ recognized that cause as justifying divorce.

A. H., North Carolina. A farm is owned equally by a man and his wife, and the deed is signed by both. The wife desired to sell her share of her land, but she cannot, for the husband will not consent. The husband rents the farm and collects the rent, and will not pay the wife her portion of her rent. If his wife sues for her share of her rent, will the law of North Carolina, where she lives, allow her the rent?

Such a matter between husband and wife ought to be adjusted amicably without going into court. Any good local or county lawyer or justice will advise concerning the rights of each under the law of the State. Neither can legally deprive the other of a proper share of the estate or its revenues, and either party withholding such share from the other would probably be compelled to make restitution with interest, of the full amount so withheld.

Inquirer, Charlotte, N. C. What is the meaning of the gold, silver, hay, stubble, etc., which are to be tested by fire (I. Cor. 3: 12, 15)?

They are the work and the teaching that men give and do believing that they are serving Christ. There are some men who act unwisely and injudiciously in the pulpit and in ordinary life. They mean well, but being proud, or conceited and ignorant, make mistakes, or act from wrong motives. Their work will perish, but the men themselves will be saved.

W. B., Elena, Miss. 1. Who does the nobleman represent in the Parable of the Pounds (Luke 19: 12-27)? 2. Why does he give the pound to a man who has already ten pounds? 3. Was he justified in slaying his servants who would not have him to reign over them?

1. Christ himself. An incident of the kind had occurred in Judaea, just before that time. Archelaus had gone to Rome to receive the appointment as successor to Herod, and the Jews sent a deputation to follow him and oppose him. So Christ's hearers would understand his allusion. 2. Because the man with ten pounds had proved his capacity and industry. God blesses the man who avails himself of his opportunities. It is so in this world. An employer does not give general increase of salary or promotion; but the man who serves him best and is already receiving the highest salary gets advantages. 3. It was what an Oriental monarch would do. The enemies of Christ who reject him deserve, and must expect, punishment.

Old subscriber writes:

A number have asked, why was Missionary Ridge so named? In 1817 a courageous little band of missionaries was sent out by the American Board of Missions to a rambling, low-lying mountainous tract of land southeast of Chattanooga (and on the line between Georgia and Tennessee) to carry the Gospel to the Cherokees. Through the dishonesty of a contractor, no buildings were erected for shelter, and they were thus compelled to camp in the open, and as the winter was cold, they suffered many hardships. They began building rude shelters, and a saw mill. Many Indians were converted. In 1819 the place was visited by President Monroe, who praised the work of the missionaries and called the place "God's own spot." For nearly twenty years the good work went on, until the removal of the tribe to lands further west.

W. B. W., Helena, Ark. Should the following quotation read: "Tis a wise father that knows his child," or "Tis a wise child that knows his father"?

The quotation is from The Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare), and reads: "It is a wise father that knows his own child."

P. A., Harman, W. Va. How long was Thomas Gray in composing his Elegy on a Country Churchyard?

It was possibly the outcome of years of thought, but the actual work of composition was accomplished, at intervals, in a few months. His Ode to Eton College appeared in 1747, and the Elegy two years afterward.

T. E. C., Ishpeming, Mich. What is the meaning of (Rom. 1: 17) the just living by faith?

The apostle is quoting Habakkuk 2: 4, in which the prophet points out that even in the approaching calamities, the righteous people would be supported by their confidence in God. The apostle, quoting the passage in Romans, shows that faith is not a new principle of life, as it was prominent in the Old Testament. Beyond the fact of faith being the channel by which men enter into life, it persists all through the Christian's career. If the Christian lost his faith, his means of maintaining his spiritual life would be cut off. There are many Christians so worried and harassed that they would succumb if they were not sustained by their faith in Him who is invisible.

C. E., Waterloo, N. H. Examine the leading weekly papers for the weeks before New Year's, and you will believe, as I do, that the newspapers help sell more whiskey than all the saloon-keepers.

A sweeping statement, but unquestionably true of many localities, during the holiday weeks. There are many publications, too, otherwise of a high class, and very far above the ordinary secular paper, that come to us with these advertisements of all sorts of intoxicants prominently displayed in their columns. Apart from the moral question, there is here a point of law which our temperance friends might rest, as to the right of vendors to sell liquor in any or all States indiscriminately by such means.

scholars. Dionysius in A. D. 240, was one of the earliest to express a doubt. It was attributed to John Mark, the companion of Paul and Barnabas and the author of the Gospel of Mark; to John the Presbyter, to Cerinthus, and others. The majority of German scholars agree with Luther in denying that Revelation was written by the apostle. On the other hand, there is internal evidence of John's authorship. His description of himself is in the manner of John. The apostle was the only man of prominence of that name who was banished to Patmos. The addresses to the seven churches of Asia show a knowledge of them consistent with the fact that the apostle was their overseer. On the whole, there seems good reason to believe that it was written by the Apostle John. The differences in the style of the Gospel and the Revelation, which are very marked,

The Smoot Inquiry Resumed

NEW WITNESSES DISCLOSE MORE OF THE SECRETS OF THE INQUITOUS MORMON CHURCH

WHEN the investigation of the Reed Smoot case was recently resumed before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, some startling testimony was introduced. The mysteries of the Endowment House were uncovered by one who swore that he had been through these peculiar ceremonies at least twenty times.

J. S. Wallis, the witness in question, joined the Mormons in London in 1851, and went to Utah in 1890. The Aaronic and Melchizedec priesthoods, he explained, were bound by many obligations and oaths. The penalty for violation of secrecy is to have the throat cut from ear to ear, and the tongue torn out by the roots. The second penalty is to have the breast cut open and heart and vitals torn therefrom. The first Melchizedec oath was scarcely less awful; it ran thus:

"We and each of us solemnly covenant and promise that we will pray and never cease to pray Almighty God to avenge the blood of the prophets upon this nation, and that we will teach the same to our children and our children's children, even unto the third and fourth generation."

Wallis recited this in solemn and dramatic tones, but rather spoiled the effect by acknowledging to Judge Worthington, that when he took the Endowment vows he "thought it was a kind of vaudeville performance."

"I never believed very much in the celestial marriage business," he said. "I stood up as a proxy in four marriages of living women to dead men. Before the marriage it is necessary to take the Endowment vows, and I guess I've been through the temple twenty times within the past five years. The ceremonies are always the same, and require about two hours."

One of the witnesses examined was Mrs. Margaret Geddes, a Scotchwoman. She is about forty years old. She was converted to the Mormon faith in her native city, and went to Utah twenty years ago, where she became the plural wife of William Geddes, in Logan, Utah. As her husband had another wife in Oregon, she did not live with him very long. Mrs. Geddes broke down and cried several times as she was giving her testimony. The effort was made to prove that Mrs. Geddes is now a plural wife, and that she contracted her latest marriage since the manifesto making polygamous marriages illegal was issued.

Apostle Abraham Cannon's plural wife or rather widow, told her story. She is now Mrs. Fred Ellis. She was Cannon's cousin, and married him in 1879, he at that time having two other wives. Some time in 1896, Mr. Cannon, being at that time one of the Twelve Apostles, decided this resolve to the witness about six weeks before the marriage, giving as his reason for taking a fourth wife, that she was to have married his dead brother, so he wanted to marry her. The witness continued:

"I told him he couldn't marry her lawfully, and he said he would marry her outside of the United States. The evening he left for California he told me he was going to marry her 'for time,' and she would be his brother David's wife for eternity. I told him if he married her, there being a law against such marriages, my conscience would not allow me to live with him, as the marriage to her would not be acknowledged by the Church. He told me that she was going with him to California, and that President Smith was going, too. He returned July 2, and was very ill, and died in two or three weeks."

Mrs. Ellis learned of the marriage about two weeks after it had taken place. Shortly afterward her husband died, and Mrs. Ellis gave it as her opinion that this fourth marriage was the cause of Mr. Cannon's death. He was worried and conscience-stricken.

August Lundstrom, an ex-Mormon Church official and missionary, also testified. He left the Church because he could not accept the dictates of the Church leaders as the revelation of God, and binding upon his conscience. He had been through the Endowment ceremony six times. He lost faith in the Mormon religion when new revelations were made and innovations introduced. He could not believe, he said, in the leaders of the Church as "living oracles," nor that their words were revelations from God.

This witness created much laughter by some of his answers. When asked by Senator Burrows whether he believed in the manifesto, he answered that he did not; that "it seemed to him as if God had changed his mind, or that Woodruff (the Mormon President), had made a mistake, or else there was a mistake in the first revelation." The witness admitted that he had been a polygamist, but "only to a certain extent." He married one wife, and was sealed to another in the temple; but as this second woman was "dead when he was sealed to her, he did not seem to think that it ought to count."

John T. Nicholson, chief recorder of the temple at Salt Lake City, proved an unwilling witness, and did what he could to obstruct the investigation.

Other testimony of the same character was elicited. It is probable that the Committee will adjourn over the Christmas holidays.

The New Birth

NEW life naturally begins in a new birth. Evangelists sometimes represent the beginning of the Christian life as so simple and trivial a matter, that the hearers conceive that it consists in only raising the hand and subscribing their names to a card. Evidently that was not Christ's idea of the momentous change. It is so radical, as we learn from the conversation with Nicodemus, that it involves a complete change of nature. The person who is born again, parts with his former life and begins a new life, with changed principles, changed motives and changed aspirations. The world is new to him and he to the world. The change is not necessarily sudden or violent. It may be a process covering a long period, as in the case of one who has been from infancy under Christian nurture. Gradually the principles of the new life may have taken possession of the soul, and almost insensibly, the passage may have been made from the old to the new. But in the case of one who has been absorbed in worldly thoughts, pleasures and pursuits, the change is sure to be clearly defined and definite.

It is a turning to God of the whole nature. Before it occurs, the objects of life are centred in the world. How to make money; how to enjoy the world's pleasures; how to get on in life, occupy the first place in the thoughts and endeavors. Afterward, they take a subordinate place if they continue at all. The first place is taken by the desire for spiritual development; by complete submission to the will of God, by sincere effort to fulfil all his requirements. Not only is conduct changed, but the very thoughts and affections are altered. Sin becomes distasteful. Things that were once pleasant and enjoyable lose their charm, and higher and purer pleasures take their place. It is no longer necessary to ask whether this or that course of conduct is forbidden, the person has not longer any desire for doubtful indulgences. He is so earnestly and sincerely concerned for higher attainments that he willingly sacrifices in the pursuit, anything that may prove a hindrance.

How can such a radical change proceed from faith? Faith is a more potent force than is generally supposed. From the human side it may involve complete change of conduct. We can imagine a person suffering from critical illness. The patient is urged to discard the medical attendant under whose treatment he has been placed and place himself under the care of another physician. The change may be fraught with the issue of life or death. If he has faith in the new physician, he places his life in his hands. In such a case faith is a crucial question. In the matter of the soul there is even more at stake, though people do not realize the fact. To one really anxious for his soul's salvation, it is risking a great deal, to cease all effort and give himself wholly into Christ's keeping. When he is convinced of Christ's power and love, he yields to him and henceforth he becomes a new man. On the divine side, Christ accepts the trust and his work begins. The transaction is momentous and complete. That is justification, and it stands at the entrance to the Christian life.

The work that Christ does in him, and for him, is wonderful. It is as Paul says: "the power of God, and the wisdom of God." The new birth is a surrender to a power that is limitless. All things become possible to him that believeth. The young Christian is conscious of new life. Augustine, meeting an acquaintance that he had before his conversion, who reproached him for passing without a greeting, with the words, "It is I, August," was answered by the saint: "It is not I, August has passed away. I am a Christian." The old life with all its connections and associations was gone forever, and Christ had given the new life which was to continue throughout eternity. What he can do for one who gives himself wholly into his hands, to be made over and renewed, passes understanding. It is learned only by experience. It is indeed regeneration—a new birth.

The Bold Pilgrim

GOOD morning, brother traveler,
Pray tell to me your name,
And where it is you are going,
Likewise from whence you came?

My name it is Bold Pilgrim,
To Canaan I am bound;
I am from yonder wilderness
And the Enchanted Ground.

Pray what is that upon your head,
That shines so clear and bright?
Likewise that covering on your breast,
So dazzling to my sight?

What kind of shoes are those you wear,
On which you firmly stand,
Likewise that shining instrument,
You bear in your right hand?

'Tis glorious Hope upon my head,
And on my breast a shield.
This sword I've drawn to fight with sin,
Until I win the field.

My feet are shod with Gospel peace,
On which I boldly stand,
To fight for right until I die,
But I'll win fair Canaan's land!

You'd better stay with me, young knight,
And give your journey o'er,
Your captain he's quite out of sight,
His face you'll see no more.

My name it is Apollyon,
This land belongs to me;
And for your arms and pilgrim's dress
I'll give it all to thee.

Mistaken, sir, the pilgrim said,
Your offer I disdain;
A glistening crown of glory
I shortly shall obtain.

If I but hold out faithfully
To my dear Lord's command,
I shortly shall be heir with him,
To Canaan's glorious land.

The trees of life and heavenly fruit,
Behold how thick they stand,
Blow, gentle gale, and bear my soul
Away to Canaan's land.

How Canary Birds Help a Mission

MRS. ANNA H. HYDE

IN these days of widespread Christian activities, many varied ways are utilized by good men and women to further the spread of the Gospel and, in the interest of humanitarian work. One of the most singular yet devised was brought to the attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD lately by Mr. T. F. Crane, of Newark, N. J.

In that city resides Mrs. A. H. Hyde, who for a number of years was a local missionary worker, but is now a partial invalid. Her heart, however, was so strongly attached to the work that she felt that she must still be doing some service for the Master, no matter how insignificant. Being a great lover of canary birds, she began last spring the raising and training of canaries, deciding to devote the proceeds of her unique venture to missionary purposes. Soon her little home was crowded with feathered singers, and she was soon assured that she would have no difficulty in marketing them to advantage.

Mrs. Hyde devotes the money obtained through these sales to the support of medical missionary work among the lepers near Jerusalem. Speaking of Mrs. Hyde's canaries, Mr. Crane says: "Only one bird has died since she began. She has made a very careful study of her pets, and it is exceedingly instructive and entertaining to hear her describe the home life of these sweet little singers. Surely her example would stimulate others to good works. Her home at Coe's Place, near Marshall street, Newark, N. J., is so ancient that one can not learn the date of its construction, but I judge it is not far removed from Revolutionary times."

Always Interesting

I have been reading my Good Manners for All Occasions, and am much pleased with Mrs. Sangster's writings. Always interesting and her advice so wholesome. The Calendar is beautiful, and I thank you many, many times for it. Miss H. C. New.

WHERE THE CANARIES ARE TRAINED

Training Armenian Orphans

MISS CORINNA SHATTUCK, the well-known American missionary at Oorfa, has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the first report issued of the industrial experiment at the Oorfa Mission. This Mission is now known as the American Home. She writes:

We have fifty three boys in our Home; of these, thirty-eight work in our different workshops. Their health is exceedingly good, considering that the thermometer is from 100 to 106 in the shade for four hours a day during July and August, but our boys sleep out in the open air. Their spiritual attitude is very good. This is shown in their prayers and in the way they learn passages of Scripture.

We have now five shops, two of these for carpentering and cabinet-making, and one each for iron work, soft red leather work, and boot and shoe making. The class of tools used are of a very low standard, and we wish as soon as possible to replace them by good tools from abroad. The greatest need in our carpenter shop is a circular or band saw and turning lathe (one that would turn wood or iron), and a boring machine for iron work.

One set of small boys work in the carpenter shop, and another in the iron shop. These work only part of the day. Our older boys work in the middle of the day, being better able to stand the heat. We have three assistants to a native cabinet-maker. The latter is able to get many orders.

Since beginning my work here on April 20th, our manufacturing output has included chairs, kindergarten chairs, sofa cradles, clothes-boxes, rush-seated stools, small tables, folding writing desks, besides draught-board boxes, small clothes boxes, lamp stands, large tables, etc. Besides the above, we had much work fitting out the Girls' Industrial, Girls' Orphanage, Boys' Home, Blind School, and Boys' Industrial, which I think shows very well for the willingness of our boys to work. All our work has been sold or ordered.

We have much to thank God for, in his dealings with us all, in the beginning of our industrial work, and desire your prayers and your active co-operation, so far as it is possible, for our future.

To this report, which is signed by Manager G. T. Gracey, Miss Shattuck adds that any contributions for the Manual Training Department sent to her personally will receive prompt acknowledgment.

Miss Shattuck tells this touching incident: "One of our boys—a fine fellow—was called to the heavenly home just a month ago. He met the call joyfully, saying in reply to an inquiry: 'Why should I fear? My Jesus is with me.' His earnest, and exceedingly faithful Christian influence remains for all who knew him. It was not in vain that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers carried the support of this young lad for years. He was the very first to be taken into the orphanages from Adayaman, in 1896. He is the first of our boys who has died."

Building the Rest Home at Chefoo

FROM a letter just received from Rev.
J. A. Stooke we get the good news that a beginning has been made on the building of the Missionary Rest Home at Chefoo, China. As one section of the new structure is to be named as the gift of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in recognition of their contributions, the news is welcome, as it will be a memorial on the other side of the world of the generous interest they take in every good work.

Our friends in China are evidently proceeding in faith, for the funds for finishing the building and furnishing it are not yet in hand. They hope that before the hot weather and the rainy season come on, the edifice will be completed, as that is the dreaded unhealthy period when it is most needed. The present contract includes seventeen single and double bedrooms, with dining and sitting-room, each twenty-four feet in length. There is to be a veranda around it seven feet wide.
This will enable the convalescents to sit out of doors and enjoy the health-giving breezes of the beautiful bay. The walls are now up as far as the veranda level, and the door-frames are in place.

It is hoped that the building will be much larger than this, and provision is made for adding new sections as funds are received, for the demand is sure to far exceed the accommodation so far provided.
The Missionary Societies of the various denominations have always, unhappily, missionaries whose health is in need of such a refuge. Their condition is not sufficiently serious to justify abandoning the work and returning to America. That painful necessity is sure to come, eventually, if they continue their labors in the unhealthy climate while their strength is depleted; but when the new Rest Home is furnished, a few weeks' stay there will restore them and send them back to the scene of their labors with renovated powers.

To finish the building, even in this contracted form, $2,800 are still needed, but the funds have hitherto been supplied so liberally, that Dr. Hunter Corbett, and the committee of which he is chairman, felt that it was better to go forward, as every day's delay imperilled the completion of the work before the time when it will be needed. As all the denominations will share in the advantages offered, the requisite amount ought soon to be in the hands of the treasurer, and a beginning be made for a larger contract. The benefits of the Home are so obvious that they should appeal to every one. The missionary in that far-away land is the representative of the Church of Christ. It was to the whole Church that Christ gave his command to preach the Gospel in every land. All of us cannot go, but the missionary who does go, has a right to expect that those who stay at home should hold up his hands, and make such provision for his health as he would have enjoyed if he had remained at home.

Besides this, the proposed Rest Home is a measure of economy. It obviates the need of prolonged periods of rest and of the expenditure of money for the passage to America, to say nothing of the pain of a long illness and the risk of life. Every one knows that a brief intermission of labor at the critical time may avert a serious illness, and it is for this that the Rest Home is being built. We most cordially endorse the appeal of the committee to our readers. Those who have not already contributed and are intending to do so, would confer a favor by sending their contributions speedily to this office, and we will forward them to the committee in China. Thus there will be no need to suspend the building operations, and the Home will be ready to receive the first relay of debilitated missionaries early in the new year.

exceptional ability, an excellent speaker, ed to the Lord's work. He took full charge of the religious service at the close of the Convention.

In his salutatory, the new President says:
"The object and aim of the Gideon Association of America is to love and be loved, and do all we can to bring others into this great environment of God's love, each one to do his part in the sweet spirit of love for all that is good and true, and the building up of one of the most noble movements in America. Let each one pray for the other, and the combination and union of all hearts daily in prayer to God, cannot possibly fail to bring about the desired results. We are now a great power in the field, and each Gideon has his influence, and can, if he will, do something every day to advance the work."

JOHN'S WITNESS

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Gospel of John is the Gospel of witness that Jesus is the Son of God; the word "witness" in the Greek occurs in it thirty-six times, and nine times in connection with John the Baptist. We see him bearing witness of Christ as the Light, of the new birth, of the Transfiguration, and of the priority of Christ in regard to himself, that he was the Only-begotten of the Father, and he who declared him.

This witness of John aroused attention. He became a popular man. The city of Jerusalem was stirred when the people heard of the ascetic preacher in the desert, who told of the imminence of the promised Messiah, and of his coming kingdom. Multitudes went out into the desert to hear him. This stirred up the teachers of the people, who "sent priests and Levites to ask him, Who art thou?" And this man who had been so much used to stir the multitudes, had not a word to speak about himself. He never said, "I am the son of the priest Zacharias." I am not in his vocabulary. He had sent him to whom he bore witness, and his thoughts and vision were filled with him. "I am not the Christ." "I am not." If we would be true followers of Christ our spirit will declare to a self-centered generation. "I am not." "I am crucified with Christ" (Gal. 2:20); "I deny myself" (Matt. 16:24).

But this commission of inquiry was not satisfied. And yet, instead of asking, "Who, then, is the Christ to whom thou bearest witness?" they again inquired about John, whom all men recognized as a prophet, the first for about 390 years! "What then?" they ask. "Art thou Elias?" referring, no doubt, to the prophecy of Malachi, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (Mal. 4:5, 6).

But again John answered as before, "I am not." "Art thou that prophet?" referring to the promise of the prophet whom the Lord would raise up like unto Moses (Deut. 18:5). And he answered, "No." Regarding himself, all was in the negative.

The questioners were puzzled. They were accustomed to men who made the most of themselves and valued themselves to the disadvantage of others. Here was a man whose word swayed the multitudes, whom everybody recognized to be a prophet, but who was utterly devoid of self-consciousness and self-assertion, who was evidently lost in, and absorbed by, his message. He was an unusual man in a world where "all seek their own" (Phil. 2:21). John had deeply appropriated the spirit of Him to whom he bore witness. He had an advantage over the twelve apostles, in that he was filled with the Spirit of God from his mother's womb (Luke 1:15), whereas they were only thus filled on the day of Pentecost. Had he been among them, he would not have taken part in the strife which of them should be the greatest; he saw greatness only in One—He to whom he bore witness. No education, no teaching, can make a man like John the Baptist; it was God the Holy Ghost in him who made him what he was.

Thus when his interrogators pursued their inquiries, and urged him to answer, "Who art thou! that we may give an answer unto them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?" he only said of himself what the Scripture had said of him (Isa. 40:3): "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias." Oh, that we had learned to say of ourselves only what Scripture says of us! John's questioners were Pharisees, the ritualists of that day, and they saw things from the ritualist point of view. They did not ask John how he came by the unusual spirit which he manifested. They had no eyes for this. They did not ask him about his communion with God, or ask whether he had authority from heaven for his ministry. They fixed on the outward sign: "Why baptizest thou, then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet?" John at once turns from the ritual observance to the deep reality. "I baptize with water; but there standeth One among you, whom ye know not; he it is, who, coming after me, is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." And St. Matthew tells us that he added, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire"—the baptism of the Spirit into the body of Christ (I. Cor. 12:13; John 1:17-27).

The Missionary Call

MY Saviour, Lord of all,
I heard thy loving call,
Thy call for me.
What wilt Thou have me do,
All, all life's journey through?
I consecrate anew
My all to Thee.

"Go, take my bread and feed
My brethren—those in need—
Nor let one die.
I am with you always,"
I heard thy dear voice say.
"Thy word I shall obey,"
Was my reply.

Hence I shall leave those near,
My parents, brethren dear,
And sail away.
Some day I hope to meet,
Some day I hope to greet
All, at the Master's feet,
To stay for aye.
